> I am instructed, therefore, to express the hope of the Government of Canada that the United States of America will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

Was that the end of it? It was the end of the April 8 note. But to show how our Canadian friends keep their fingers on what transpires in America, and how they are remaining alert, when the Committee on Public Works, first, by a vote of 7 to 7 on a motion to table, and then by a vote of 8 to 6 to report the bill, reported the bill to the Senate——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Wisconsin yield to the junior Senator for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield under the same conditions stated heretofore.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that although the bill was reported by a vote of 8 to 6, three of the eight members of the Public Works Committee who voted to report the bill favorably recommended that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. WILEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true, therefore, that a majority of the Public Works Committee is telling the Senate that in its judgment the bill should go to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. WILEY. That is absolutely true; but I also wish to make clear that I am satisfied that the other members of the committee feel likewise. At least one of them said to me, "We are only the Public Works Committee. We have not had time to go into the issue, which belongs under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee. In fact, we are not competent to do so, because we are not schooled in the field of foreign relations."

In other words, I think it is very clear that although I submitted this brief to the Committee on Public Works, a brief which I have caused to be placed on the desks of Senators, I presume that members of that committee, like Senators who are members of other committees, felt that they were not sufficiently informed about the diplomatic phase of the matter as it concerns our relations with Canada. At the time I attended that committee's meeting, I think only three members of the committee were present. As a consequence, they were not informed on the subject which I am now discussing. I am certain that a majority of the Senate and of the people of the country are not informed about it.

I observe that the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] has entered the Chamber. I may say to him that I have caused to be placed on his desk a brief which I hope he will take the time to read, particularly the exhibit which is attached and which is the position of the Canadian Government, stated in no uncertain terms. The Senator from Kansas will find that it is the unanimous position of the Canadian Government with respect to the proposed diversion of water from Lake Michigan. All I ask is that every Senator afford himself the opportunity to examine this brief.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on this very important point?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not the clear policy of the leadership in the Senate on virtually all bills to accept the recommendation of a majority of the committee, and to adopt that recommendation as the position of the leadership? In other words, is it not true, in the absence of some overriding party policy or some traditional policy of the Democratic or the Republican Party, that when a committee makes a majority recommendation, the leadership honors its recommendation and does its best to see that the majority recommendation is carried out?

Mr. WILEY. I think that as a matter of policy that is true. On the other hand, there are many exceptions. But I think the Senator has proved by his statement that the majority of even the Committee on Public Works was in favor of having the bill referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not probably true, as was indicated by the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], that many Senators do not know that the recommendation of the Committee on Public Works is that H.R. 1 be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. WILEY. My answer to that would be that I have not canvassed that situation. I have not asked any Senator to support our position. I feel that the solution of this matter is something for each individual Senator to reach when he realizes the significance of the issue which is here presented. I hope that the position which my colleague implied in his question is the correct one.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not important that Senators, like the two Senators from Wisconsin who oppose the bill, do all in their power to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee which reported the bill in this instance itself recommended that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

In view of the fact that most Senators have only a cursory interest in other than national matters, matters which do not apply to their own States, do they not place great reliance and trust in the judgment of the committee and vote in accordance with the majority decision of the committee?

Mr. WILEY. I hope the Senator is right in what he implies. This is not the complete answer so far, because after the committee reported the bill to the Senate by a vote of 8 to 6, two or three Senators, as suggested by my distinguished colleague, proposed that the matter be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

When it became known to Canada that its previous note had received apparently—I say apparently—no consideration—which was not true—and when the committee reported the bill, the conclusion was that the Senate had been sold a bill of goods and that the previous note had not been called adequately to the attention of the Senate.

So on August 20—and, as I remember, the bill was reported several days before that—the Department of State received the following note. From whom? From the Canadian Government, through its Ambassador. I quote:

> I have the honor to refer to my note No. 184 of April 9, 1959, concerning legislative proposals to increase the diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago.
> I am instructed to inform you that the Government of Canada has taken note of the recent legislative developments in the United States concerning this matter.

That means the action of the committee.

> In this connection, I am to advise you that the Government of Canada explicitly reaffirms the position set forth at length in the above-mentioned note.

What note? The note of April 9, 1959, which I have been discussing.

> In the view of my Government any additional diversion of water out of the Great Lakes watershed would be inconsistent with existing agreements and arrangements which together constitute an agreed regime with respect to these waters. The proposed unilateral derogation from the existing regime therefore occasions serious concern in Canada.

I think we might again ask ourselves about the serious concern in Canada.

> Please accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

I am concerned. Let Canada know that I am concerned and that my colleague from Wisconsin is concerned. I trust that the majority of the Senate is concerned. That means we are not flouting the notes of a friendly nation. It means we are giving consideration to this very serious matter. It is a serious matter when men will ignore such a responsibility as is ours today. It is very serious.

Mr. President, there is something else. I realize, as I have said heretofore, the influence of the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I realize also the influence of the minority leader, the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Senators on both sides of the aisle have come to me. I have not asked them to vote for anything in all my years as a Senator. I again say, as I said earlier, that I have a high concern for the integrity of the Senate. Senators come to me and have said, "I am sorry, but I have pledged my word."

I again say: "Pledged your word? And you know nothing about the proposal?"

One Senator who said that came to me this morning. He said, "You are right. I had not gone into this matter. I gave my promise, but it was a blanket promise, without knowing the facts. I now know the facts. I have read your note. I know what the issue is. It is bigger than Illinois against five States. The real issue is whether America will keep faith."

Mr. President, when I was privileged to attend the Queen's visit to Canada, I saw then the distinguished Member of our House of Representatives who accompanied the Senator from Illinois. I refer to Representative YATES, who previously had accompanied the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to Canada, to have our Ambassador there arrange for them a consultation with the Prime Minister of Canada. All these matters are covered in the material I have attached to my statement, just to show how attempts have been made to use influence.

I do not condemn what these two distinguished gentlemen did; but neither do I approve. Certainly our State Department has its own functions.

Let us see what was said in the Canadian House of Commons on April 23:

> WATER RESOURCES—CHICAGO DIVERSION—MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MEMBERS OF U.S. CONGRESS
> On the orders of the day:
> Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Laurier). May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister be good enough to tell the house whether he received Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois, this morning in order to discuss with him the question of the diversion of water from the Great Lakes basin into the Chicago drainage canal; and would the Prime Minister say, if he met the Senator, what was the result of the interview?
> Rt. Hon. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Prime Minister). The honorable member for Essex West also intended to ask this question. Some few days ago the U.S. Ambassador suggested that it might be possible for me to meet with U.S. Senator DOUGLAS and Congressman YATES, one a Member of the Senate from Illinois and the other a Member of the House of Representatives from the same State. They were here this morning and I met with them, though they were not here in any sense as an official delegation, because the suggestion had been made that the meeting might provide an opportunity for them to place before the Government the views which they hold respecting the bill which would provide for an additional diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago.

I listened to the expression of their views and we had a very interesting talk together, but I may say without any equivocation that I was unable to offer them any hope that as a result of the expression of their views the known opposition of the Government of Canada to the bill would in any way be diminished.

That is clear enough, I think, to make it understandable to all that while I was very happy to meet with these gentlemen, their views did not alter the views expressed in the message to the Acting Secretary of State of the United States, sent by this Government on April 9.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes, without losing the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin what was wrong concerning the visit of the Senator from Illinois and Representative YATES to the Prime Minister of Canada? What fault does the Senator from Wisconsin find with it?

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator from Illinois ask what was wrong about it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; what, if anything, was wrong with that?

Mr. WILEY. I did not imply that anything was either right or improper.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then why is the Senator from Wisconsin bringing up this matter?

Mr. WILEY. I am talking about the Senator's attempts to influence. I am talking about how the Senator from Illinois exerts his influence on the floor of the Senate, on Members of the Senate. I am talking about how he and the O'Brien outfit in the House of Representatives even got promises to vote so-and-so. That is what I am talking about. I am trying to expose the fact, so it will not happen again. I am saying that what we need is an exposition of the facts, and no more trips by Members to Canada, to visit the Prime Minister of Canada—for, after all, relationships between our Government and the Canadian Government are the function of our State Department—and no more attempts to get the Prime Minister of Canada to switch the views of Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I make the point that the Senator from Wisconsin is out of order.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the Senator from Illinois. I could say that, in a sense, he is an awfully good contractor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Wisconsin is out of order, and should be required to take his seat.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded; and the Senator from Wisconsin may proceed.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Chair. Of course, I have the floor. It seems that, at least to some extent, I have gotten under the skin of the Senator from Illinois.

I was referring to the fact that the Senator from Illinois went to Canada, to attempt to meddle with governmental business in Canada. That is really something to think about. I do not know whether any bill or any law was involved. I am simply calling the facts to the attention of the Senate.

The Senate now has before it H.R. 1. The fact that only a few Senators are now in the Chamber indicates clearly that the attention of most Senators has been occupied by other matters. But I want the RECORD to stand; and I have been quoting from the debate which occurred in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. President, earlier today my attention was called to an editorial entitled "Snitching Great Lakes Water," which was published today in the Washington Post. In connection with the arguments I am making at this time, I desire to read part of one of the paragraphs of the editorial:

> Sponsors of the bill try to justify riding roughshod over Canada's wishes regarding these international waters by saying that officials in Ottawa have shifted their position in the last year. Spokesmen for Canada deny this emphatically, but even if it were true we do not see that it would have any substantial bearing on the issue now before the Senate.

I think the record shows very clearly, Mr. President, what effect a little bit of influence had in connection with the debate last year. I am sure it reached even into the State Department, at times.

But Canada reaffirms her position. She has stood firm, through the years, on this matter.

I wish to say very definitely that if the matter had not gone, last year, the way it did, the scalp of someone would have been nipped a little bit. I do not refer to any Senators; I refer to folks in the State Department, who, I am sure, were taking action not consistent with what Secretary Dulles knew on the subject.

Mr. President, as my dear associate would say, I am just getting into my speech; at this time I am really getting into it. He has done a wonderful job. Mine will not equal his, because, although he is young in years, he is old in wisdom; wisdom has really gotten into his gray matter, so that he can take care of almost anyone, on any occasion.

We recall the way he politicked in Wisconsin. He really had no trouble at all going up and down the highways and byways of that State, into the factories and onto the farms. He did not make any promises; he simply talked and proceeded to present the facts.

So, as—of course—one of the younger Members, myself, at this time I feel so chipper, as I contemplate this subject, that I shall certainly continue my remarks for another 3 or 4 hours; and then we shall see how the gentleman feels on the subject.

Mr. President, in pointing to the dangers of the pending bill, we are attempting to show that the bill is, first, against our domestic interests, and, second, threatens our relations with our good neighbor, Canada. However, the enactment of an ill-advised bill would also create danagerous far-reaching repercussions adverse to the U.S. interests around the globe. Historically, the United States has an honored reputation for living up to and carrying out in letter and in spirit our agreements with other nations. The proposed legislation before us threatens to negate that history, to destroy our reputation for integrity, honesty, dependability, and good faith in international negotiations.

As one who has been on the Foreign Relations Committee for a good many years, I submit, Mr. President, that this matter of international honesty, integrity, and dependability is not just talk. It is a matter that receives serious consideration in the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee. If we make an agreement, we have got to know that the folks with whom we are dealing have got the character to carry through. That has been our policy through the centuries and the decades.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Amen.

Mr. WILEY. And good faith in our international negotiations is imperatively necessary. If we become the exponents of breaking faith, what effect will it have?

Let us look at a few ways by which the interests of the United States could be adversely affected. First of all, the evidence presented to the Senate is in the form of views of the Canadian Government. These are overwhelming proof that the pending legislation, if enacted, would be a definite violation of both the spirit and the letter of an agreement with that friendly country.

The proponents of this bill are proposing that we ignore these two protests of Canada; that we refuse to live up to the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 and the Niagara Treaty of 1950.

We had better ask ourselves such soul-searching questions as, What would this do to us in the eyes of the world? What would this mean, first, to the reputation, dignity, and stature of the United States, if we deliberately and flagrantly took action that violated the spirit and the letter of such international agreements?

Secondly, President Eisenhower is now traveling abroad to further cement understandings and agreements with Great Britain, Germany, and France. What would be the effect of the enactment of this treaty breaking legislation by the U. S. Congress?

What would be the effect? Well, I am sure that some of my colleagues heard the President say last night that we have lived in peace with Canada, without fortifications on a boundary line 3,000 miles long. Senators know what the effect would be if we set the example now of breaking agreements.

What would be the effect of the enactment of this treaty breaking legislation by the U.S. Congress? What would it do to our chances of reaching an agreement abroad? In effect, it would seriously handicap or contribute to destroying the purpose and hope for success of the President's mission.

But my objection, Mr. President, is deeper even than that. I am an American, and I believe in keeping faith. I believe that our agreements or treaties must be inviolate so far as we are concerned.

What would such action—and I am referring to passing the bill—do to future negotiations for treaties, economic agreements, or any other negotiations between our country and other countries? Just this: The confidence of the nations of the world in our willingness to live up to treaties and agreements would be seriously undermined.

I hope each Senator will recognize the significance of his position. I just hope that the effect of his vote will reach back into his constituency, because the effect of voting for the bill would be, "I do not give a tinker's blank as to what our agreement with Canada is. I do not believe we have any business considering our treaties with Canada."

Such a vote might have serious effect on some persons at the next election.

A suggestion was made this morning by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, when he was talking about the voters in Chicago. Well, I have letters from Chicago; and if I had time, I could tell something about the district's actions and what the people think of the district. I am not going into that, because that would be just another diversion. That would be just following the tactics of my distinguished associate from Illinois. I am sticking to the point, to the issues. It does not make any difference in that respect what the neglect of the district has been, what it has been accused of; and I might say that the people of Chicago, by an overwhelming vote, want the district to clean up the mess, the same as the Supreme Court has said many times it was the function of the district to do.

And if at this time we very clearly indicate by an overwhelming vote that we want the district to clean up the mess, too, they will probably go ahead and do it. But if we delay or if we have a close vote which indicates that the Chicago bunch in the House can keep on having an excuse for being reelected each time by putting in these bills, then we will find out something different. I am asking, in the interest of international justice, international integrity, international dealings, that we keep faith.

I am also asking for order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, under rule XIX, I suggest that the Senator from Wisconsin is out of order and should take his seat.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Senator is not even asking a question. I object.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin referred to me and my colleagues as "the Chicago bunch." This is a violation of rule XIX. I respectfully request the Chair to rule upon my point of order, and, if my point of order is well taken, that the Senator from Wisconsin be requested to take his seat.

Mr. WILEY. I do not yield for a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under Senate Rule XIX, when a Senator reflects upon another State the Chair has no discretion but to ask the Senator to take his seat.

Mr. WILEY. May I be heard, Mr. President?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed upon the adoption of a motion to that effect.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senator from Wisconsin be permitted to proceed in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington. [Putting the question.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin may proceed in order.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, may I suggest also that the point of order, which I think the RECORD will show, is not in accordance with reflection on a State. My remarks related not to Illinois, but they related to the district. I want to get that clear. I want to say, if it were pertinent and if it were not another diversion, I would produce evidence right from the records; but I make it plain that that is not my point.

I wish to say, I shall abide by the rule, if I correctly understand it. Does it relate to the State?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. WILEY. I should like to know whether the rule has application to a city or to a district, or whether it relates to a State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that any reflection upon a portion of a State would be considered to be a reflection upon the State.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Presiding Officer refer to any section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any reflection upon a portion of a State would be considered as a reflection upon the State.

Mr. WILEY. I will abide by the rule, but I must call attention to the fact that they are not all angels in Chicago.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin may proceed. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I want to pursue my presentation.

I think the last thing I spoke of was: Thirdly, what would such action do to future negotiations for peace treaties, economic agreements, or any other negotiations between ourselves and other countries? That is a very important question, Mr. President. The confidence of the nations of the world in America must not be shaken by an action which would result from this proposal before the greatest deliberative body in the world.

Look at the Senators. Yes. Confidence must not be shaken.

Fourth, the enactment of legislation to authorize treatybreaking would be a tremendous boost—for what? It would aid Communist propaganda. Can Senators not see that? Can Senators not see what propaganda the Communists would send throughout the country? They would say, "America—America, which poses to be so clean, which poses to have such moral concepts, to never break its word—ah, look at what it has done. It has violated the treaty of 1909 and the treaty of 1950, setting up in detail the agreements."

The passage of the propsed legislation would be a tremendous boost to the Communist propaganda. Over and over we have accused the Communists of failing to live up to their agreements, of tearing up treaties, of violating in every possible way agreements which they have made with other countries. Who did that? We did that, on the floor of the Senate. We have spoken out time and time again. The Government of the United States, speaking through its department, has called attention to that fact.

Mr. President, we are asked to follow in their footsteps. We are asked to follow in the footsteps of the treaty breakers. Are we now to put ourselves in the position of aiding the Communists? Are we now to do that? Are we to be irresponsible? Are we to destroy the integrity—yes, the dependability—of a nation which, in the eyes of the world, now deserves the utmost respect?

If this should happen—and I sincerely hope it will not—Khrushchev could laugh at us at future East-West negotiations. That would be a wonderful reception for him when he comes to America. There is not any question about what he would put on the radio and television.

Khrushchev would tell us, "You have been posing as great international moralists. You have been talking about living up to agreements. You have been accusing me. What about your obligations under the 1909 treaty and under the 1950 treaty? What about your obligations under the St. Lawrence Seaway agreements, to maintain it intact?

Mr. President, the question of this threat to our national dignity and integrity is really a serious one. I have mentioned before how serious I think it is. I am going to repeat it.

In this world of tremendous friction and challenges, with possibilities of a catastrophic eruption, there is one thing we have to establish, which is that when America gives its word it keeps its word. When the President speaks, as he has, to Mr. Adenauer, and when he gives his word, we are going to keep his word. When the President speaks to the Prime Minister of Britain, as he spoke last night over the international television broadcast, we are going to keep his word. When the President goes to France, we will do likewise.

I feel we are going to keep faith with Canada. We are not going to permit ourselves to be sabotaged into a lot of weak thinking. Instead of being siphoned off up a blind alley, we are going to keep our eyes on the prime issue, which is that Canada and America have to live together and to work together, as they have in two wars fought together. So we are going to keep faith.

Rarely, if ever, in our history has there been such a concerted effort by a special interest to "throw to the winds" the traditional reputation for integrity, high standards of conduct, good faith and conscientiousness which our country has had down through its history, as it has attempted to live up to its agreements.

I respect the proponents of this bill as good Americans. I can only believe that in this case their heads are under the water. They are not seeing beyond their local cause. They fail to realize the dangers—the far-reaching dangers inherent in this proposed legislation. I sincerely hope that this phase of my argument will have the effect of opening up their eyes and getting them out of this water which seems to embarrass them as they present their viewpoint.

In the note there was brought out the statement that every diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreases the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes.

We can get down now into some of the facts relating to what we might call the domestic issue, which of course crosses with the foreign relations issue of our dealings with Canada. The Government of Canada, it was said, is objecting to any action which will have the effect of reducing the volume of water in the Great Lakes.

In relation to the second ground, the Supreme Court said in 266 U.S.:

> With regard to the second ground, the treaty of 1909 with Great Britain expressly provides against uses affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters without authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and approval of the International Joint Commission agreed there.

The prominent word there is "uses." It provides against uses affecting the natural flow of boundary waters without the authority of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada.

Let me say, confirming the statement I have just made in relation to Canada's position, that diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreases the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes, let me say that the language I have just quoted is also in substance the language of a great American, Henry L. Stimson, who in 1913 said:

> In a word, every drop of water taken out at Chicago necessarily tends to nullify costly improvements made under direct authority of Congress throughout the Great Lakes. (Marquette Law Review, 155.)

That is pretty clear. I think Mr. Stimson at that time was Secretary of State; I am not so sure. He said, among other things, that it would nullify expenditures of an amount of money, millions of dollars, as well as inflict even greater loss upon the navigation interests using such waters.

We will take now the provision that has been asserted by U.S. jurists, that article III of the treaty applies, that no further diversion shall be made without the approval of the International Joint Commission.

Yesterday there was quite a discussion of that, and if we take article III of the treaty we find that the statements made yesterday were pertinent and applicable. The court has said that if article III of the treaty applies, then no further diversion shall be made without the approval of the International Joint Commission. Is there any provision in there indicating that the proponents want to refer the question to the Commission for approval? Look at the bill. Of course I am discussing the first amendment.

The Niagara Treaty has been mentioned, and the specific inclusion of certain added waters in article III of the treaty emphasizes the underlying assumption that existing supplies will continue unabated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield for a question, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin know and understand that at present the International Joint Commission is making an investigation, upon the joint request of the Dominion of Canada and the United States Government, about a proposed diversion of water in the Columbia River Basin 700 miles north of our border?

Mr. WILEY. Yes, I have that information. I thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio for bringing it up at this point, because it is very relevant. In other words, if we were to break the treaty we have, there is no question in my mind that Canada would have justification for doing the very thing the Senator mentions without approval of the Commission, because we both agreed that we would submit such matters to the Commission. This is absolutely what we might call a tangent effort, over and above our agreements in that regard, to get the Congress of the United States to do the dirty work.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that when Canada proposed to do some diverting of the headland waters of the Columbia River basin, our Government thought that the treaty of 1909 applied, and that our Government said, in effect, "Let's not get into a dispute about this. Call upon the duly constituted machinery, the International Joint Commission, to hear the testimony and render a decision"?

Mr. WILEY. I thank the distinguished Senator again. His statement is one of fact, a fact that I would have covered, but it will not be necessary now, because our Government and Canada have "played ball" for 140 years. They have never broken faith between each other. This is the first instance where anyone wants us to breach the faith by legislative action.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WILEY. For a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that when the Dominion of Canada submitted to the International Joint Commission the problem of the water use in the Columbia River Basin it in effect said, "We entered into a solemn agreement with you designating how disputes shall be settled, and we contemplate abiding by that solemn agreement"?

Mr. WILEY. I again thank the Senator. In that he is stating a very important fact of our relations with our great neighbor to the north. Through the decades, as I have said, ours has been a friendly relationship, based upon moral responsibility and legal responsibility.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield for a further question, Mr. President?

Mr. WILEY. Under the conditions heretofore stated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And is it not a fact that the Dominion of Canada in protesting this contemplated increase of a thousand cubic feet per second in the diversion at Chicago has called upon us to use the procedures set forth in the 1909 agreement to settle this misunderstanding?

Mr. WILEY. I think the Senator is correct. Again I state that it is pursuant to agreements between our two Governments. There is the 1909 treaty. Of course, that was a treaty with Great Britain, and after Canada became a Commonwealth she assumed the responsibility. What is more, she has lived up to everything in that treaty through the years. She has kept the faith. That is Canada, keeping the faith.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And is it not a fact that if the pending bill shall be enacted it will be the first time in our history, at least with Canada, that we have broken our word?

Mr. WILEY. I would not say at least with Canada. I should say that the American doctrine is that a treaty can only be abrogated by mutual consent of the parties. That has been our policy, and we have lived up to it.

Of course, when we found that we were attacked, that of itself, in several instances, made it necessary to abrogate a treaty, but there is no instance I know of where America, having entered into a valid treaty in relation to any subject, has broken faith. America has the reputation throughout the world of being a nation that keeps faith, that lives up to its word; moreover, it is the great helper of humanity. In the past 10 or 12 years we have spent some $60 billion in seeking to resuscitate nations of the world which were formerly our enemies. If the Senator heard the President last night, he knows that President Eisenhower and Mr. Macmillan agreed that one of the big challenges was to continue to see to it that some 600 million people or more living under submarginal conditions are given a helping hand. That is America. That is the Senator's country and my country. I will not be a party to putting a black mark against its name.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that on the floor of the Senate, on the floor of the House of Representatives, in the columns of the writers of the Nation, and in the words of commentators on television and radio, the argument has been repeatedly made that the word of the Soviet Communists and of the Red Chinese Communists cannot be depended on, because of repeated violations of international treaties?

Mr. WILEY. That is a correct statement. The same statement has been made on the floor of the Senate, in the press, and by those high in authority. That is one of our present problems. The President went to Europe with the idea of consolidating the West, obtaining unity of approach. He is doing one of the great jobs of history. I take off my hat to him. When Khrushchev comes over here, I am satisfied that what President Eisenhower is accomplishing over there will have an effect on Khrushchev.

But we recognize that while the Russian people—some 200 million of them—are good people, the philosophy of Khrushchev and his crowd is not the same as ours. They do not think as we do. They have not the same moral responsibility. As a consequence, when agreements are made, we shall have to be wary. We must keep our powder dry, our eyes open, and our ability to take care of ourselves intact.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in the general approach of the Red Soviets to responsibilities, and to what we recognize as justice, they interpret words and make their decisions on the basis of what will best serve their cause? In other words, everything that is helpful to Soviet Russia is right. All that is neutral or harmful is wrong; and on that basis they approach their responsibilities.

Mr. WILEY. In reply to that statement, let me say that I believe the common people of Russia have moral responsibility. This is not the first time in the history of the world when great bodies of people have been under the influence and thumb of a few who have precipitated great international catastrophies. History records the fact that ambition is a tremendous force for evil. We have seen it in the case of Hitler and the Kaiser. In the development of the history of the people of the world we have seen how Britain, France, Spain, and other nations have sensed, as they thought, the need for world domination. Before them came Greece and Rome, and before them Egypt and other nations.

But the world is different now. If such a process were to start again, by intercontinental bombs and missiles we could destroy the race.

Second, the issue is so important and conditions are so different that we learn to keep faith with governments, either through fear of what might happen if faith were broken, or through an understanding of the divine principles of brotherhood. In that way we can get results.

We do not believe that the Kremlin sees things as we do. It has done a stupendous job for the Kremlin. With our assistance their nanny goat was saved. They have now precipitated revolution all over the world, based upon several factors, the first of which is the submarginal living standard of many peoples; second, a desire for political freedom. The leaders in the Kremlin have given aid to revolutions. They are indulging in that practice now. They are undoubtedly behind the Chinese attack on Tibet. There is no question that in Southeast Asia they are precipitating the Communist drive.

All those things bring us to this conclusion: When we talk, words mean different things. If we were to talk about moral responsibility to Khrushchev, as the Senator has suggested, he would not understand what we were talking about. His idea is based upon the lust for power, for world domination—one world, under the domination of him and his group. That is his mission. It seems to me that we should realize that we must not, by our own acts, contribute toward making him more effective on the world's stage.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I am glad to yield provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin, what would the reaction of our American citizenry be if there were brought pointedly to their knowledge the fact that the U.S. Senate is asked to violate a solemn promise and agreement made by the United States with the United Kingdom and with the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. WILEY. I have great faith in the moral responsibility of our people. I was brought up in a Christian home. I am sensitive of the fact that one of the things that was taught was, "Never give your word unless you can keep it."

What is needed in the world is more spiritual perception, so to speak—a comprehension of the verities of life. I am satisfied that among the one-hundred-seventy-odd-million Americans there is the fundamental conclusion that if and when the facts are known, they will resent the enactment of such a proposal as is before us. I am satisfied that they are a people who keep the faith, especially when relationships between our country and another country are involved.

That is the strength of our Government. That is what gives President Eisenhower strength in Europe. The people of Europe know America. They know the history of America. They know how we have kept faith during the decades and centuries.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I wish the Senator would express his appraisal of what the impact would be upon our youth if they were told that the U.S. Senate, designedly and with full knowledge of the facts, had decided to break a solemn promise and agreement which our Government had made with the Dominion of Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. WILEY. That is a very important question, and one which has had my consideration through the years in my own life. What is my impact upon youth, so far as I may have a little influence? In my humble opinion the effect of what the Senator describes would be very detrimental. I am satisfied that it would give impetus to the "roughnecks" we read about in New York, Chicago, and elsewhere—people who break faith with society, those who feel that they have no obligation to be honest, those who feel that theirs is to be a life of ruthlessness.

In my opinion, today we are debating an issue which has consequences which neither the Senator nor I can foresee. We can simply conjecture. Yet we know, that in the homes where the children are taught Christian morality, to keep faith, and to live decent lives, if and when Khrushchev or others start their propaganda, and the word goes out that we are breaking faith with our best friend, the effect will be very detrimental to the stability of the youth of our Nation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator please express his opinion on this statement: No greater responsibility and service rest with a government than, by its conduct to its citizenry, to demonstrate that it believes in the basic virtues of life, and especially in the obligation to keep one's word.

Mr. WILEY. I respond by saying that I am very grateful that the great State of Ohio has sent its distinguished senior Senator to the Senate. I have marveled at his grasp of the spiritual verities. I have heard him, in our little breakfast group, discuss the fundamentals of life. The Senator is making a great contribution to the thinking of America. I hope his ideas will receive wide circulation. The senior Senator from Ohio is discussing something so fundamental—so fundamental—I repeat it the third time: so fundamental—that we cannot ignore that issue in this particular matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Let me conclude. Then I will yield.

I am satisfied that the Senator from Ohio has brought up in his interrogations today things which will make it possible for me not to have to carry on a great deal longer, because I was going into the moral issues, which the Senator from Ohio grasped so fundamentally, and which are involved in this very matter. They will have an impact upon not only the youth of America but also upon the older people of America.

I thank the Senator from Ohio. He has done great work heretofore by asking questions, and he is doing a greater work now in his questions because he is bringing home to all of us a responsibility which we must not overlook.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In the Christian boyhood of the senior Senator from Wisconsin, to which he has alluded, did he learn the Ten Commandments?

Mr. WILEY. I think I learned them. Did the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator remember the Commandment: Thou shalt not bear false witness?

Mr. WILEY. Yes. I have never seen anyone who bore more false witness than the Senator from Illinois in his argument. I have heard it; I have listened to it.

Now may I continue? Are there any further questions from the distinguished Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask a further question.

Mr. WILEY. I yield provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has the Senator from Wisconsin either read or heard the argument that Soviet Russia violated its treaty with Poland, and stabbed Poland in the back? That Soviet Russia violated its treaty with Germany, and engaged in a war with Germany? That Red China promised religious freedom to the Tibetans and broke its word? That Soviet Russia, in agreements made by Stalin, Churchill, Roosevelt, and Truman, promised that the citizens of the captive nations—I think there are 17 of them—were to have the right, by ballot, to determine the type of government they wanted, and that that right of ballot was denied?

Mr. WILEY. I am very familiar with those matter, which have had our consideration, and which have at least opened the eyes of some of us to what might be called the pervading philosophy of the Kremlin. It will be realized, of course, that when those treaties were broken, much suffering was caused. It is all a part of the push, so to speak, in which the Kremlin is engaged for world domination. If they cannot do it by their own effort, they will get some of their stooges to go ahead and do the job.

The Senator from Ohio refers to the fact that the Soviet Government broke its word, its agreements, and its treaties. That is what they want us to do in this instance.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. I read from the Niagara Treaty of 1950:

> The specific inclusion of certain added waters in article III of the treaty emphasizes the underlying assumption that existing supplies of water will continue unabated.

Who said that? In the first place, our Court has said it, in substance. In the next place, the Government of Canada has said it. The assumption is that the water supply will remain unabated. Is the taking of another 1,000 feet on top of the 3,300 feet something which was settled by a judgment of the Court? Not by Congress, but by the Court? Subsequent applications have been made. To whom? They tried the Court; they have not tried Congress. Have we not enough to do without settling this difference? Or will we go ahead and become embroiled, session after session, in this matter?

I suggest that the U.S. Senate, in no unmistakable terms, settle the matter by voting so overwhelmingly that the proponents of the bill will not expect to come back next year again with it.

> In addition to these provisions, there is a further agreement of far-reaching importance. Power development in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec is predicated upon agreed criteria for regulations of the flow of the St. Lawrence River.

We have agreed with Canada to maintain the flow of the St. Lawrence River so as to provide for power development.

> The order of approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, as supplemented on July 2, 1956, and accepted by both our governments, forms the basis for the construction and operation of the hydroelectric power installations in the international section of the St. Lawrence River.

Some of us have seen that development. Some of us have had a little to do with it. Some of us do not want that international development damaged. I repeat:

> The order of approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, as supplemented on July 2, 1956, and accepted by both our governments—

Let us get back again to 1956—> accepted by both our governments, forms the basis for the construction and operation of the hydroelectric power installations in the international section of the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. President, in that area Canada and the United States are, together, building great powerplants from which power is being distributed; and in all that great undertaking, the two countries are playing ball together.

But now some want to have that fine relationship broken.

Mr. President, the criterion of the order of 1956 and the order of approval assumes a continuous diversion out of the Great Lakes Basin limited to 3,100 or 3,200 cubic feet of water a second. But now Chicago wants to be allowed to divert an additional 1,000 cubic feet of water a second.

Mr. President, it is stated by the highest authority that the agreement provided for limiting the diversion at Chicago to the present 3,100 or 3,200 cubic feet of water a second; and Chicago knew that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question in regard to the point he is making?

Mr. WILEY. I yield for a question, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the Senator from Wisconsin familiar with the statement beginning on page 575 of the book on international law, written by Charles C. Hyde, formerly Legal Adviser for the Department of State, and a longtime professor of international law at Columbia University, and presently considered the most eminent authority on international law in the last half century; and I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to comment on the statement, which deals with the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway:

> SEC. 184A. Proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway: Recognizing that the construction of a deep waterway, not less than 27 feet in depth, for navigation from the interior of the continent of North America, through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River to the sea, with the development of waterpower incidental thereto, would result in marked and enduring benefits to the agricultural, manufacturing and commercial interests of both countries; and recognizing also the desirability of effecting a permanent settlement of the questions raised by the diversion of waters from or into the Great Lakes system, the United States and Canada signed at Washington, July 18, 1932, the so-called Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty. The plan, which contemplated regulated diversions, was one which, nevertheless, subordinated the appropriations of water to the maintenance of desired levels of the Great Lakes system. Not only was there elaborate provision for the construction of appropriate works by both contracting parties, but there were also specific limitations imposed touching the amounts and the purposes of appropriations of water in specified sections of the area involved. Thus there were arrangements for the utilization of water for the production of power on either side of the international boundary in what was described as the International Rapids Section. Careful arrangement was made for the preservation of the levels of the Great Lakes System. Accordingly, it was provided that the diversion of water through the Chicago Drainage Canal—> should conform to the quantity provided under the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States of April 21, 1930; and also that in the event that the American Government should propose, in order to meet an emergency, an increase in the permitted diversion, to which the Canadian Government took exception, the matter should be submitted for final decision to an arbitral tribunal, which should be empowered to authorize, for such time and to such extent as was necessary to meet the emergency, an increase in the diversion of water beyond the limits of the decree of the Supreme Court, and to stipulate such compensatory provisions as it might deem just and equitable.

And is the Senator from Wisconsin also familiar with the fact that in the negotiations which went on and in the agreement which finally was made, it was specifically stipulated that the diversion at Chicago would be fixed at the level established by the Court in its 1930 decree?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio for reading that very fine passage. As he will recall, he and I were in the same office when we looked at the book from which the Senator from Ohio has been reading. He will also remember that earlier today I referred to the fact that the 1930 agreement settled that matter. But now we find that some seek to abrogate that agreement, and seek to do so by unilateral action.

I must also say that the 1956 decision of the International Joint Commission, which is accepted by both Governments, forms the basis of the operation of the works in the international section of the St. Lawrence River; and, in that connection, recognition has been given to the terms of the previous stipulation in regard to the removal of 3,100 cubic feet of water a second.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Wisconsin also aware that the author of this book, who is one of the most distinguished writers on this subject in the last half century, also wrote the following:

> It was also provided that no diversion of water, other than the foregoing, from the Great Lakes system, or from the international section to another watershed should thereafter be made, except by authorization of the International Joint Commission established pursuant to the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909 (on which the United States and Canada had equal representation).

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, again I thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio. As I have said, I am proud to know him. He is making a great contribution to our consideration of this matter—as he does in connection with every matter on which he speaks, because he has such a fine mind and he has learned so very much in the university of hard knocks.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for another question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield for a question, without losing the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that throughout the entire history of our country, as regards her relationships with Canada, our country has entered into agreements which have fixed her rights and responsibilities, and there has never been an instance in which our Government has created a situation which has caused the Government of Canada to protest an action contemplated by our Government, until the making of the present attempt?

Mr. WILEY. That is correct. Since 1812 or 1814, we have never had any difference or difficulty with Canda; and even in 1812 and 1814, the difference our country had was with Britain.

But the point we make is that, through the years, Canada and the United States have set an outstanding example of the highest morality in international relationships. They have kept the faith; they have kept the agreements they have made with each other. The result is that today there are no battle wagons on the Great Lakes, and there are no fortifications on that 3,000-mile border—as was referred to so eloquently, on yesterday, by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, we must keep our relationships with Canada that way. We must maintain the great confidence which the peoples of the two countries have in each other. We must make sure that those fine relationships continue. If we do not, well, we are simply stirring up something that our children and our children's children will have to deal with. I am not going to be a party to that kind of action.

Now, I want to continue.

Navigation and commercial interests depend upon maintenance of the water level as the basis upon which channel enlargement has been designed, in order that vessels of deeper draft may proceed with full draft to and from the ports of the upper Great Lakes.

That goes to the question of, What are we going to do? Are we going to deprive ourselves of our inheritance? We, of the Middle West, feel that the great fourth seacoast which has been built by this country and Canada is to be maintained by us, and not dissipated by any action, one way or another.

The construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway, in legislation between the two countries, in several exchanges of notes concerning the construction and operation of the seaway, is all based upon the assumption and understanding that there will not be unilateral action repugnant to the purposes of the legislation.

Withdrawal of water from the Great Lakes Basin would materially affect operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Who said that? Well, the Prime Minister of Canada said that. Is he the only one? No; the Supreme Court said that in 1925, in 266 United States 405.

I might quote further what the Court said with regard to the treaty of 1909:

[The treaty] expressly provides against uses affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters without authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada.

It was our Supreme Court who said that. As I said before, the distinguished district representatives have time and again applied to the Court for relief; but now they want the Congress of the United States to take action, though the matter is pending in the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court has appointed a master.

Mr. President, I want to set something right. In the course of the debate, a statement was made to the effect that Secretary of State Root had made a statement that the treaty of 1909 was not intended to cover Lake Michigan as a boundary water; that he (Root) said that the treaty provided for prenavigation of both countries in Lake Michigan as long as the treaty remained in force. This is away back about 1910. However, the boundary waters treaty and its application to Chicago came to the attention of the Supreme Court in a suit filed by the Federal Government—let us understand that, filed by your Government and mine, Mr. President—against the Sanitary District of Chicago, wherein the United States sought to enjoin the diversion of the waters of Lake Michigan in excess at that time of 4,167 cubic feet per second authorized by the Secretary of War.

Well, the Court said—266 United States 405—with regard to this ground that "the treaty of 1909 with Great Britain expressly provides against uses affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters without authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and approval of the International Joint Commission thereon."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes; without my losing the right to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did I correctly understand the Senator to quote what the Supreme Court said?

Mr. WILEY. That is right. I quoted what the Supreme Court said.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did the Supreme Court say that under the treaty no diversion could be made increasing the flow to above what it was determined it should be in the 1930 decision?

Mr. WILEY. No; this is a 1925 case. The 1930 case reiterated the position the Senator is asking about.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes; without yielding the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator please read again what the Supreme Court said concerning the manner in which consent had to be obtained to authorize a diversion?

Mr. WILEY. I shall have to read the language I have here, which I think in part answers the question. I would have to have the case in front of me. If I were arguing in court, I would have that volume. I am presenting what I think is the important issue, because it is raised by the opposition here, which is the statement by Secretary Root. The Supreme Court has time and time again set aside that point, even on the application of Chicago. It has granted Chicago relief in its application for additional water at times when conditions got so bad that Chicago needed it. But the Supreme Court also said to Chicago, time and time again, "Clean up your mess. Go to it. Build up sanitary works. Do not defer any longer."

I shall quote one of the decisions later, not today, because I understand the Senator from Ohio wants to take the floor, and I shall be very happy to let a better man talk.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the Senator asks me whether I want him to yield the floor in favor of me, does he know my answer will be to let the Senator from Wisconsin keep on talking?

Mr. WILEY. Again I feel complimented. Let me again say that the Court used the language that I have suggested, but Secretary of War Stimson in 1913—and this is part of the answer the Senator wants—expressed the opinion that the boundary waters treaty of 1909 did not sanction the Chicago diversion and that such questions should, in accordance with the terms of the treaty, be placed before the International Joint Commission.

I want to repeat that the proponents threw the matter about Secretary Root in the debate simply to confuse the issue. Ever since his expression, the Court has taken jurisdiction, first, on the application of the Federal Government; second, on the application of the district; third, on the application of the various States that received a raw deal in this matter. So the Court has jurisdiction.

What was the issue? Should more water be diverted? Then it was that in 1930 the Supreme Court said, "This settles it. We will permit a diversion up to 3,200 cubic feet per second." The Court permitted it because of conditions and because the district had not built up its works, which the district had been told previously by the Supreme Court to do. Because the district had not built up sanitary works, the Supreme Court permitted it to have an additional amount, and moderated it so that by a certain time—I think it was in 1939—the amount had to be brought to 3,100 or 3,200 cubic feet.

Those are the facts. Now they are applying again. So the point raised has gone out the window at least a dozen times.

Today, the diversion of waters of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system through the Chicago drainage canal is governed by the Supreme Court decision of April 21, 1930, and averages 1,500 cubic feet per second plus domestic pumpage of 1,700 cubic feet per second, or a total of 3,200 cubic feet per second. That is the situation as it is. But we have to remember that the Supreme Court has maintained jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has jurisdiction. It appointed a special master recently, which shows its jurisdiction. In spite of that, the Illinois drainage district wants the Senate of the United States to take over. One point I want to emphasize is that since the day on which the bill was originally referred, new and highly significant evidence of Canada's objection has been presented to the United States. I want to repeat that. Since the bill was presented Canada has come forth twice, emphatically stating its position. The appropriate forum for the analysis and evaluation of the bases for the objections is the Committee on Foreign Relations. Our relations with our good neighbor to the north have come a long way since our own Northwest rang with cries of "fifty-four forty or fight." Through long years of working patiently toward peaceful solution of mutual problems, the United States and Canada have become cotrustees of the natural resources of the North American Continent, and cotrustees, to a large extent, of the peace of the world. If we create differences, what will be done by some of these Communists who are reaching out, in all directions, to take over? What will be the effect on our relations with South America, to say nothing of the effect on the rest of the world? We are the cotrustees of the peace of the world. If we break faith, we may set an example which may interfere with that cotrusteeship.

Are we to throw away these long years of cooperation and turn a deaf ear to our cotrustee when she voices grave doubts about the legality of a unilateral move we are planning? Or are we going to study those objections and weigh those doubts and make our decision only after a thorough evaluation of the issues? These international issues have not been thoroughly examined yet.

These issues are numerous. They are complex. They should be explored and evaluated during the course of the debate on the floor of the Senate, but they should also be examined in the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Canadian objections to this bill should be given careful analysis in the Committee on Foreign Relations so that they may be there distilled by the members of this body whose function is to consider all matters pertaining to relations of the United States with foreign nations.

Mr. President, I repeat, when the bill came from the House and was sent to the committee—not to the Committee on Foreign Relations—the committee received a note from the Secretary of State setting forth what I have talked about today. The committee received a copy of the Canadian note. But it received more than that. The committee received evidence from the Canadian congressional record, if we want to call it that. After the committee had reported the fact to the Senate, again the Canadian Government sent its note of August 21, in which it reiterated its objection and in which it said, among other things, that "the Government of Canada explicitly reaffirms the position set forth at length in the above-mentioned note."

The Canadian Ambassador said, in no uncertain terms.

In the view of my Government any additional diversion of water out of the Great Lakes watershed would be inconsistent with existing agreements and arrangements which together constitute an agreed regime with respect to these waters.

The Ambassador said:

The proposed unilateral derogation—

Those are awfully good words, "unilateral derogation"—or kicking Canada in the teeth—

from the existing regime therefore occasions serious concern in Canada.

Mr. President, I shall yield the floor in a few moments. I shall engage in this battle until it terminates. I shall have much more to say later on.

At this time I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I yield to the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee to observe the time. Is it now not after 2:30?

Mr. GORE. That is right; yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that the Senate convened this morning at 10 o'clock?

Mr. GORE. That is true.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator from Tennessee be surprised to learn that this is the first quorum call the Senate has had today?

Mr. GORE. I should not be surprised, because I have been listening.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator not agree that it is customary, when it is desired on the part of opponents of a bill to delay, to engage in dilatory tactics, to frequently suggest the absence of a quorum? Is that not true?

Mr. GORE. Well, it is true in some cases. It would not necessarily be true in all.

I do not understand the purpose of this catechism. I rose to address the Senate on another subject.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for yielding to permit the Senator from Wisconsin to make this point. Will the Senator yield just a little further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that if the opponents of the pending bill desired to delay a vote on the bill, rather than discuss its merits, they could with very little effort have suggested frequently the absence of a quorum, rather than engage, at substantial effort to themselves, in stating as fully as they could their position on the bill for the enlightenment of the Senate?

Mr. GORE. I agree that a number of parliamentary maneuvers are available to those who wish to use them for dilatory purposes or otherwise. I have not noticed any such parliamentary maneuvers today.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask the Senator to yield for a concluding question.

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that the opponents of H.R. 1 have made absolutely no use whatsoever of the quorum call as a dilatory measure to prevent a vote today?

Mr. GORE. If so, I am not aware of it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, is it not also true that live quorum calls were demanded on three or four occasions in previous days? Is it not also true that there have been no quorum calls today because these very able filibusters would be taken off their feet, so that what they are parading as a virtue has really been a parliamentary device, and is not this a further tribute to the astuteness of the incipient great filibuster here, the junior Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hold the senior Senator from Illinois and the junior Senator from Wisconsin in the highest esteem and in a state of warm personal affection. However, I had no intention of stepping into this matter. I wish to address the Senate upon a very serious subject.

INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, yesterday 39 issues of U.S. Government bonds sold at alltime total lows.

Mr. President, there was a state of alarm in many financial circles yesterday. There is a state of uneasiness prevailing throughout our country.

While some pretend that all of this is a happenstance, while some pretend that the Government has no policy which brings this about, while some contend that this is a mere accident, I find that this rise in the prime interest rate which was put into effect yesterday was forecast in an article in the Evening Star of last June 12, and for those who contend that the action of the Government has no bearing upon the interest-rate structure of the country, I suggest that they read this article. It was written by Donald B. Hadley.

Mr. Hadley conducted an interview with the banks of the city of Washington. I should like to read his article. It is worth, in my opinion, the attention of the Senate.

This is under date of June 12, just about the same time, Mr. President, that officials of our Government were undertaking to lead the public to believe that the action of the Federal Reserve System in raising the rediscount rate, which it had just done, would not result in increased interest rates throughout our country.

I should like to read the article, which is as follows:

Washington bank borrowers are beginning to feel the effects of the latest increase in Federal Reserve System rediscount rates and the prime rate of New York banks.

Rates on renewals and new loans have been raised in the last 2 weeks by most Washington banks and the result has been a certain amount of shopping around by borrowers for the best possible terms.

Extent of the increases are difficult to determine, but for all but the smallest loans they have amounted to around half of a percentage point. Many who have paid 5½ percent must now pay 6 percent. The smallest loans will be affected little, especially where maximum rates already are being charged.

D.C. BANKS LENT UP

While customers shopped around, their activities were somewhat limited by the fact that Washington banks in general are just about lent up and there is not much rush to lend more money. A number of institutions would have to borrow from the Federal Reserve on rising rates or sell bonds and they do not desire to do this.

Another reason the bankers are not interested in competing for loans is that New York bankers are predicting a further rise in the prime rate before the end of the year. Commonly mentioned in the predictions is a 5 percent rate.

Self-protection requires bankers to keep in line with competitive rates in times of credit stringency, one banking leader pointed out today.

"Some of our customers may think we raise rates to make more money, but we keep our ears to the ground and our rates in line with our competitors so as to avoid being swamped with demands for loans," he said.

"Word gets around fast if one bank does not go along with higher rates and terrific pressure builds up for loans, some of it from depositors and businessmen who have been associated with the bank. It might make it impossible to serve our regular customers properly."

BANKERS MUST PAY MORE

The Federal Reserve Banks' rediscount rates, the interest which banks must pay if they have to borrow funds for relending purposes, were raised to 3½ percent recently.

New York City banks raised the prime rate on bank loans to 4½ percent from 4 percent and banks all over the country follow this lead because the largest supply of lendable money is there.

Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that this article was written on June 12. This prediction came true yesterday. It was clearly understood that it would come true. In fact, but for some speeches on the floor of the U.S. Senate, according to an article in the Wall Street Journal, the New York banks would have put this interest-rate increase in effect sooner. Let me read from an article in the Wall Street Journal of yesterday. It was printed before the rate went into effect. It states that the banks had contemplated raising consumer loan rates earlier during the summer, but "held off when President Eisenhower's proposal to remove the 4¼-percent ceiling on longer term Government bonds stirred protests in Congress against higher interest rates generally."

They delayed a while because there were protests in Congress about rising interest rates. But the Congress is about to adjourn, so they proceed to put this increase into effect.

I express the view that had Congress approved the request of the administration to give the approval of the U.S. Congress to the high-interest-rate policy, the prime rate would now be even greater than 5 percent.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The able Senator from Tennessee spoke before the Senate many, many times about the gradual drop in the prices of Government bonds. Yesterday, according to the morning newspapers, certain Government bonds dropped half a point, or sixteen thirty-seconds, on the market.

I invite the Senator's attention to this fact only because there was an article in one of the newspapers to the effect that President Eisenhower, before taking off for Europe, sent a special message to the Senate and House, and said, in effect, "Give Secretary of the Treasury Anderson the power he needs to do his job."

He wants to raise the ceiling on E-bonds. Why should a person buy an E-bond when he can buy a 2½-percent bonds of 1961 which yields 4.92%? The quotation in this morning's Washington Post shows that 2½-percent bonds of 1961 were quoted yesterday at 94.28 bid and 95 asked. The column in the Post which shows the yield indicates that the yield on that type of bond is 4.92%. If a man wants a 2-year investment, he can buy that bond and get nearly 5 percent. If he wants a 4-year investment, he can buy a 2½-percent bond of 1963, which, according to the morning newspaper, yields 4.77%, and nearly 8½ points in capital gains, which is a very low rate of taxation.

If a man wants a 6-year investment, he can buy a 2⅝-percent bond of 1965 for 89.24, with a yield of 4.76%.

Does not that point up what the Senator from Tennessee was calling attention to all last spring and the year before, that the tight money policy was driving down the value of securities which had been bought by working people on payroll collection plans, with the guarantee of the United States behind them?

Mr. GORE. I think it does, and I think the figures the able Senator has cited demonstrate that while this policy may be a bonanza to a few people, it spells economic harm or disaster to many people.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The article states that the Congress has given the "ho-hum" to the request to do something about the rate on E-bonds. Is it not a pretty good thing to call attention to the fact that when people buy E-bonds, they can go into the market and buy much higher yielding bonds without difficulty?

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Congress has been trying to say to people, "Save your money." But they are not so happy when they find themselves in a situation in which, having saved their money and bought bonds, the bonds which they bought for $100 have dropped to $89. I think it is a very bad thing for people who have bought such bonds, as well as for the credit of the United States, to have them drop to extremely low points.

Mr. GORE. I should like to inquire of the Senator if it is not a matter of his personal knowledge that many small banks in the United States would be bankrupt today if they listed their Government bond portfolios at market prices?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would never say that a bank could be bankrupt; but I will put it this way: I believe that many banks across the United States would have to substantially reduce the amounts they carried in their surplus accounts if they put their Government bonds in at what they are worth.

One day I came across the statement of one particular bank which had a few million dollars in capital surplus, but a $1 million loss in its Treasury bond account. That is not a permanent loss, perhaps, but it is a pretty serious loss.

Mr. GORE. If a bank sustained a loss on its Government bond portfolio greater than its net assets, would it not be bankrupt, whether we wish to use that term or not?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know of a bank that has sustained a loss greater than its capital structure, because I am sure the Government would be required to do something. Banks are allowed to carry the figures representing capital surplus on their letterheads and windows, and in announcements to the public.

The fact is that the Government bond list has gone down so much that it presents a very serious problem to the banks.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that the Government, the FDIC, and the bank examiners, permit banks to list their holdings of Government bonds at par value, instead of market value?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have sought verification of that, and of what happened to the banks which have substantial amounts of long-term Government obligations. I was advised by the FDIC that it is the standard policy, backed up by the law, that the banks can account for such bonds in their reserves at either their par value, which would be 100 cents on the dollar, or at market value.

Thus, as I understand from the FDIC, they can take a writeoff of capital losses, and if they are in a highly profitable position they enjoy a certain tax advantage by being able to write down these bonds.

Second, a small bank, which may have a large portfolio of long-term Government bonds in its reserves, is subject to criticism by the examiner if the portfolio is not sufficiently balanced by short-term Government bonds. Thus the U.S. Government securities are placed in the same category as are doubtful loans which have been made the bank, and the examiner criticizes the bank if the proportion of holdings is not well balanced as between long-term and short-term bonds.

This is the ultimate of disregard for securities issued in the name of the U.S. Government. It is the direct result of the Government-enforced and Government-promulgated policy of raising interest rates, and thus lowering the market values of every single security which is out.

The 2½-percent bond is worth less for every one-fourth of 1 percent interest which the new securities bear. Yet we have put Government interest rates on an escalator by direct Government action which was not authorized by Congress.

Congress has consistently voted rate increases for GI housing, FHA, and similar forms of loans. But the Government was not satisfied with the legislative increases in interest rates on all Government-insured mortgages and securities. The Government has raised interest rates administratively, such as on Farmers Home Administration loans. They have done it to the full extent of their authority. So no stone has been left unturned by this administration to force upward, upward, and upward, in an ever-increasing, rapidly moving spiral, the cost of borrowing money, first, for the U.S. Government, which must be paid for by the taxpayers; and, second, for persons who must borrow money for businesses or farm operations, and whose interest rate is directly related to the interest rate which the Government is currently paying.

I compliment the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], and many other Senators, who have consistently voted against this policy which will drive us into a worse inflation, and sooner or later into a "bust" which will be the rival of any depression the Nation has ever had.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. Does not this action mean that the cost of living will go higher?

Mr. MONRONEY. Interest rates today figure heavily in almost every substantial purchase which any buyer makes. If he buys a car, the interest cost is generally about 10 percent more. If he buys a home, interest will be 20 or 25 percent of the cost of the home. The cost of the groceries he buys reflects the upward interest rate which the processors must pay for their expanded plants. The little businessman must pay the increased cost of interest. It is a cost of living which is added as a result in Government policy.

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I enter into the colloquy only to compliment the Senator from Tennessee for calling attention to the situation now, as he has done many times in the past. The import of the article this morning was that the Treasury cannot issue long-term bonds at very high interest rates. What that does to the national debt is plenty. The cost of servicing the national debt has gone up $2 billion in the last 2 years. If the Government could issue more long-term bonds at 5 percent, it would saddle on this country a long-term debt of staggering proportions.

Mr. GORE. I believe the able Senator from New Mexico was present at a meeting of the Committee on Finance within the last 2 or 3 months, at which Mr. Stans, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, admitted to the committee that the increased cost of interest on the national debt was $500 million in excess of what he had estimated it to be in the budget presented in January.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Tennessee is quite correct. Mr. Stans gave that as an explanation of why the budget would be out of balance.

Mr. GORE. So the administration has unbalanced its own budget by driving the interest rate artificially higher.

Mr. ANDERSON. I could not agree with the Senator more.

Mr. GORE. That either condemns the administration as the worst forecaster in history or the worst manager of the public debt in history, if not both.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I only wish that some of the financial writers and others who purport to give basic information on what Congress is doing would at least publicize the fact that President Eisenhower in his message to Congress was asking for power which no President in our history, from George Washington down to Dwight Eisenhower, has ever enjoyed. Up until the period of World War II, every President in history had to seek the authority from Congress for the dollar amount of each bond issue and for the rate of interest which would be paid upon those bonds. No President had the authority, even since World War I, to issue bonds without the direct authority of Congress for the issuance of the bonds, and the authority to pay a definite, fixed interest rate at which Congress authorized long-term bonds to be floated.

During World War I, the constant need for the replenishment of Government resources led Congress to grant authority to the then Secretary of the Treasury, Carter Glass, to issue bonds without fixed limits as to the amount. But the 4¼-percent long-term interest ceiling which has been in effect since World War I was placed on those bonds as a part of the historic right of Congress to maintain control over the currency. We have lived under the 4¼-percent ceiling since World War I. Yet, without considering this historic practice, the President has come before Congress in the closing days of the session and has asked for an unlimited interest rate on long-term bonds without Congress having any right whatever to say what the limit shall be. This action should be explained and made known to the American people, who are so conscious of the executive grab for power.

The Senator from Tennessee remembers the days of President Franklin Roosevelt. It was he who drove down the interest rates and tried to break the stranglehold of the big banking interests on the money markets. Whenever he asked for additional Presidential power, the heavens fell in in editorial criticism. Yet the man in the White House today has asked for something which no President in history has ever enjoyed, and we are told editorially that Congress must supinely lie down and yield its vast power so as to commit the Government, for 20 or 25 years, to paying interest rates which will run somewhere above 4¼ percent, perhaps to 5 percent, 6 percent, or 10 percent. Once issued on a 20- or 25-year basis, there is no recall. So even if Congress should grant an extension of 1 or 2 years, the Government would pay through the nose for 20 years for whatever high interest rate is fixed on the long-term bonds.

Mr. GORE. The refusal of Congress to be pressured by the administration and the big-money interests into placing its stamp of approval upon the high interest rate, tight money policy is one of the proud performances of Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator familiar with an article which was published in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning, under the byline of Mr. J. A. Livingston, and entitled "A Matter of Justice to Government Bond Buyers"?

Mr. GORE. I did not read the article, I am sorry to say.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Livingston is also a reporter for the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. His column is syndicated. Therefore, its publication in the Washington Post is a matter of peculiar interest to me. I understand the Senator from Tennessee has the article before him. I call his attention to the next to the last paragraph of the article, which reads:

> For Congress to adjourn without acting on the interest rates would be irresponsible.

I wonder whether my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, agrees with that rather strong statement.

Mr. GORE. I thoroughly disagree with it. I believe it would be very hurtful to the country for Congress to place its stamp of approval upon the tight money policy. Congress should stand firm. Congress should use its constitutional power to force the administration to abandon its unwise monetary policy, which is driving interest rates to artificial and historic heights.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator from Tennessee agree with me that for Mr. Livingston to make such a statement is, in itself, irresponsible?

Mr. GORE. I am not acquainted with the degree of capacity of Mr. Livingston to understand the monetary situation. If he understands it, and still makes such a statement, it is irresponsible. If he does not know the subject about which he writes, his statement would be characterized as ill-informed chatter.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Livingston is a well-known financial writer of what might be called the Ricardian school of economics—a school entirely obsolete and thoroughly discredited, but much in vogue with big bankers and Wall Street financiers. It is the same school of economics to which Mr. Edward Collins belongs; and he has been writing Ricardian articles which have been published not only in the New York Times news columns but also editorials in the same fine newspaper.

I should like to suggest to my colleagues that those in the administration who are so complacent about rising interest rates, which make it far more difficult for the Government to balance the budget and stabilize its financial operations, should read more modern economics and should pay more attention to what is recommended by Members of Congress who have studied this matter, and should pay a little less attention to what writers such as the ones to whom

I have referred are saying on this subject.

Mr. GORE. I have read the writings of the gentleman to whom the able Senator from Pennsylvania has referred, and upon occasion I have wondered whether they have studied anything later than the writings of Adam Smith.

Mr. CLARK. The same thought has occurred to me.

Mr. GORE. And I have wondered whether they are aware of the current economic facts of life.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Livingston further stated in the article—after saying that it "would be irresponsible" for Congress to adjourn "without acting on the interest rates"—

> It would justify President Eisenhower's calling a special session.

The other day, on the floor of the Senate, my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], whom I also see in the Chamber at this time, suggested that it might be wise to call a special session on the subject, so that Congress could educate not only the financial writers of New York and Philadelphia, but also the people of America, in regard to the economic folly behind the high-interest-rate policy of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board.

Does the Senator from Tennessee agree with that suggestion?

Mr. GORE. Of course; it was my suggestion.

Mr. CLARK. Does my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, still adhere to that suggestion?

Mr. GORE. Yes, for I believe it might well serve the public interest to have a time set aside—as a special session of Congress for that purpose would provide—to thoroughly discuss the disastrous consequences of the unwise inflationary policy which is being foisted on the American people by an administration which, on the one hand, claims it has no such policy and, on the other, asks the Congress to endorse its policy.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to comment on the further statement by Mr. Livingston:

> When the Treasury has no alternative but to sell strictly short-term securities, it is putting out the closest thing possible to irredeemable paper money.

Does the Senator from Tennessee agree that "the Treasury has no alternative but to sell strictly short-term securities"?

Mr. GORE. No; I thoroughly disagree.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the Federal Reserve Board could move into the situation and in all likelihood could, in a relatively short time, bring the interest rates back to somewhere near where they should be, if our friends on the other side of the aisle would stop shouting panic every time the interest rate went up one-tenth of 1 percent?

Mr. GORE. Yes. In that connection, I wish to cite the record. In 1957, when the recession was tightening and the 1958 elections were approaching, the administration decided to reverse its tight money policies—at least, temporarily. Mr. Humphrey retired as Secretary of the Treasury, and renewed his career of quail hunting and steel or money making; and a new Secretary of the Treasury came into office. At that time the new Secretary was interested in lowering the interest rate on Government obligations and in lowering other interest rates in the country. In this objective, he informed me, that he would have the support and the prestige of President Eisenhower.

During the first 9 months after he took office, seven Government bond issues were sold, at successively lower rates of interest. The first bond issue he floated was at 4 percent. The issue sold in June of last year was marketed at 2¾ percent.

So, Mr. President, in answer to the question asked by the able Senator from Pennsylvania, I cite the record: The Government not only can, but it has, and it can again; it is a question of determination of policy and a question of action by our Government in which is vested the constitutional power to regulate the value of money.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In that period, did not the Federal Reserve Board cooperate with the Treasury in bringing down the interest rates?

Mr. GORE. That is a matter of record, and it is true.

Mr. CLARK. Would not similar action by the Federal Reserve Board have the same result today?

Mr. GORE. There is no question whatever that this is within the power of the Government—and it has been demonstrated time and time again; and that makes me wonder how it is that so many men of sincerity undertake to tell the American people that the high interest rates now in effect came about purely by accident.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that in each instance during the 9-month period to which the Senator from Tennessee referred a moment ago, the Government bond issue at a low interest rate was oversubscribed?

Mr. GORE. I am informed that in every instance that was true.

Mr. CLARK. In conclusion, let me say that, as regards Mr. Livingston, Mr. Collins, and similar writers who endorse the position of Wall Street and the Treasury and the big New York banks, my comment would be, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. GORE. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, would not the Senator from Tennessee say that at a period of time when the Government is being threatened with having to pay exorbitant interest rates to outside purchasers of its securities, the Federal Reserve—having in mind its public duty as the central bank of the United States—should at least buy during that period a few more bonds of longer maturities?

Mr. GORE. I think the Federal Reserve should do so; and I think it is remiss in the performance of its duty and is failing to perform its statutory function.

However, I believe it is complying fully with the wishes and the policy of the administration.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. But although it is the duty of the Federal Reserve to assist in the tremendous task of the management of the public debt, at this critical period—so critical that the President has even threatened to call a special session of Congress, in order to have Congress raise the statutory interest rate, which has stood since World War I—the holdings of the Federal Reserve System are lower than they were at the corresponding time last year. At a time when the long-term holdings of the Federal Reserve should be increased, the Federal Reserve is decreasing its portfolio of long-term maturities, and is increasing its holdings of short-term maturities. This seems to me to be a case of "Wrong Way Corrigan" if they are trying to assist in the management of the public debt.

Mr. GORE. Not only is the performance of the Government self-defeating in the regard to which the Senator has made reference; the higher interest rates being forced and encouraged by the Government are now encouraging the banks, as the able junior Senator from New Mexico pointed out, to sell holdings or portions of bank holdings in Government bonds, in order to make some profitable investments. That is reported in the New York Times of today, on page 40–C.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I will yield if the Senator will let me complete reading the article from the Star. I lack only about three paragraphs. I want to complete reading the article in the Star that appeared on June 12, 1959. This, let me repeat, is the article of an industrious, inquiring, and enterprising reporter, who, at a time when spokesmen in the U.S. Congress and spokesmen appearing on behalf of the administration before a congressional committee were undertaking to say that a rise in the rediscount rate by the Federal Reserve would have no result in raising commercial interest rates, wrote a very interesting and challenging article. I will continue to read:

> Self-protection requires bankers to keep in line with competitive rates in times of credit stringency, one banking leader pointed out today.
> Some of our customers may think we raise rates to make more money—

Is it not remarkable that some customer might have such a thought? It is perfectly astounding that the thought would ever occur to an American citizen that interest rates were being raised in order that banks might make more money. But, improbable as this may appear, the banker says some people actually think that. The heretic had better watch out: he may not get a loan.

Let me continue his quotation:

but we keep our ears to the ground and our rates in line with our competitors so as to avoid being swamped with demands for loans.

Word gets around fast if one bank does not go along with higher rates, terrific pressure builds up for loans, some of it from depositors and businessmen who have been associated with the bank. It might make it impossible to serve our regular customers properly.

The Federal Reserve Bank's rediscount rates, the interest which banks must pay if they have to borrow funds for relending purposes, were raised to 3½ percent recently.

New York City banks raised the prime rate on bank loans to 4½ percent from 4 percent, and banks all over the country follow this lead because the largest supply of lendable money is there.

That is the end of the article. I wish to point out that within one 12-month period—within less than a 12-month period, by a few days—the prime interest rate charged by the New York banks has been raised 1½ percent, from 3½ to 5 percent. If Congress should place its stamp of approval upon this tight money policy, I warn the Senate that in the last year of a moribund administration, yielding as it is, and as it has, to the interests of big money combines, the prime rate might advance by another 1½ percent during the next 12 months.

This is a disastrous policy for the small businessman who must borrow in order to stay in business. It is restricting the growth of our national economy. During a period when we are in a cold war contest with the Communist world, we have had an average growth in our national gross product of only about 1½ percent a year, while that of the Soviet Union is reported to be 8 percent per year. How is that winning the cold war economic battle?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the senior Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Would the Senator give me just a moment to possibly explain the other side of the coin?

Mr. GORE. I will yield for a question, and then I will be glad to listen to the Senator's speech.

Mr. CAPEHART. The question is, Is not there another side of this coin, namely, that it is almost impossible to sell Government bonds at a lesser interest rate than one can buy mortgages for or buy existing loans for? For example, bonds today are selling for 85 in order to yield an interest rate of a little more than 4 percent.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is slightly in error. They are selling as low as 80 today.

Mr. CAPEHART. They are selling at a very low figure. The question is, How do we expect the Federal Government or the Secretary of the Treasury to sell Government bonds? He will have to sell about $80 billion worth this year at a lesser interest rate than people can get in other investments. For example, I will not ask the visitors in the galleries to stand who own E- or H-bonds, or perhaps other Government bonds or insurance policies issued by companies whose money is invested in bonds, but are these people going to continue to buy or hold E-bonds or H-bonds, when they can dispose of them and invest in other securities which pay them a larger rate of interest? They will not do it.

Mr. GORE. I shall be glad to respond to the questions of my friend, the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I agree with him that there are two sides to this coin. I am on the people's side of the coin, on the side of the people who must borrow, the interest of the people who must buy on installment, the interest of the small businessman, the interest of the citizens of the country whose welfare is involved in a growing, developing, expanding national economy. Those interests are involved on the side of the coin with which I am associated, and those who wish to preserve and reward the status quo are on the other side of the coin.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. The Senator asked a series of questions. I have replied only partially to one of them. I must reply to the others.

The able Senator has asked how the Treasury Department can market the bonds. The Senator was in the Chamber when I related the experience of the Government during the first 9 months of the incumbency of the present Secretary of the Treasury, which preceded the 1958 election. I wonder if the Senator could explain how the Government succeeded, during those 9 months, in lowering the interest rate not only on Government bonds but also in the commercial banks of the country?

Mr. CAPEHART. May I answer that question?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. It is the same sincere, conscientious Secretary of the Treasury that we have today who was then involved. I am certain the Secretary dislikes as much as I, or as the able Senator from Tennessee, the fact that interest rates are going up.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is not answering how it was done. Will the Senator tell me how the Government performed that sleight of hand act?

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not know that I can. I do not know that I want to take the time to do it. All I know is that the same Secretary of the Treasury today says that for him to properly handle the financial matters of this Nation he must have an increase in the interest rate on E- and H-bonds, and he must have an increase in the interest rates on new bonds which he sells, because the interest rates on all other things have gone up.

Mr. GORE. The able Senator says that is all he knows. I do not so deprecate the Senator. I think he knows far more than that. I think the Senator is well aware that this policy has not been the result of accident. I think the Senator is well aware that the results are not "happenchance." I think the Senator is well aware that policies of the Government have produced these results. I think the Senator is well aware that these results have been intended. I do not deprecate the able Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think the results of World War II, the results of a $290 billion debt, the results of excessive spending over the years, the results of the increase in the prosperity of the Nation, and the results of the increase in the gross national debt have required more money to handle the financial matters. The competition for money is the same as the competition for any other service which is rendered in the United States.

Mr. GORE. Well——

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator let me finish, please?

Mr. GORE. I have the floor, please.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator had his opportunity.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has said that more money is required because of the growth and expansion both of the population and of the economy. I wish to quote a New York banker, from a story which was published in the Wall Street Journal on yesterday:

We are being squeezed for money. I'd say the climate is right for a rate increase.

Yes, the supply has been squeezed. Instead of there being a supply adequate to meet the growing demands, as the able Senator has described with such great southernlike eloquence, the supply is being squeezed, and the situation was created which is described in yesterday morning's Wall Street Journal by a banker with the statement: "I'd say the climate is right for a rate increase."

Yes, the climate was right for an increase. It had been carefully prepared.

And it occurred before sundown of the same day.

Now I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is no question that there is a greater demand today for loans than ever before in the history of this Nation. There is no question that the national debt is bigger today than it was ever before in the history of this Nation.

Mr. GORE. Not in comparison——

Mr. CAPEHART. Let me finish, please.

Mr. GORE. I know the Senator wants to state the full facts. It is not bigger, in comparison with the gross national product.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am saying, if I may continue——

Mr. GORE. Yes; the Senator may continue.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Federal debt and the debts of States, cities, and counties are all greater today than ever before in American history. The debts of individuals in America are greater today than ever before in the history of this Nation. The gross national product is bigger today. That means we are doing more business. More people are employed, at higher wages.

All of this requires more money. That means there is competition for the money, and that means the people who have the money to loan want more interest. I refer to the little people, to the big people, and to the middle-class people who have money to loan. These are the people who buy the E-bonds, the H-bonds, and other bonds. These are the people who deposit money in the banks. We ought to encourage them to do so. They are demanding higher interest rates, greater interest rates, because everything they buy—shoes, clothing, automobiles, groceries, and everything else—is higher in price.

Mr. GORE. I desire to reply to the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. Let me finish, please.

Mr. GORE. I want to reply to the first part of the Senator's statement.

Mr. CAPEHART. Let me finish.

Mr. GORE. I will reply to the first part of the statement of the Senator and then yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is the Senator afraid to hear what I am about to say?

Mr. GORE. I appreciate what the able Senator is saying. I do not want the Senator to make one statement, however, and then rush to another without reply. I wish first to reply to the statement the able Senator has made, that there is a greater demand for money, that there is a greater need for money, and that there is a need for more money.

I should like to ask the Senator, do higher interest rates create more money? Or, do higher interest rates solve the problem which the able Senator has described?

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator let me answer?

Mr. GORE. I will.

Mr. CAPEHART. That does not necessarily create higher interest rates or lower interest rates. The fact remains that people are not going to buy Government bonds at a lower interest rate than they will receive if they buy other kinds of securities.

Mr. GORE. That is begging the question.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is not begging the question at all.

Mr. GORE. I asked the Senator how these higher interest rates solved the problem which he so eloquently described. There is a need for more money to meet the growing demands of a large number of people and an expanding economy.

How do high interest rates meet that demand?

Mr. CAPEHART. They do not meet the demand.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. CAPEHART. I did not say they did.

Mr. GORE. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. CAPEHART. What I said was that there is a greater demand for money, which means that people are competing for the money, and the people who have money naturally are going to loan money to the person who will pay the highest interest rate. That is all I said.

What the Senator is saying is that the Secretary of the Treasury in some way, some how, can change this. I do not understand exactly how the Senator expects the Secretary of the Treasury to do it, unless he wants the Federal Reserve to buy all the bonds.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator explain how the Secretary of the Treasury or how the Government of the United States succeeded in doing so for a whole 9-month period?

The Senator is the ranking Republican on the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator is a man who is affluent—and I congratulate him for it—in his personal affairs, a man who is knowledgeable in the field of finance. The Senator has said that his knowledge is limited in this field, but I recognize him to be possessed of a great deal of knowledge, much more than he admits.

How can the Senator explain this miracle which came about? Was it the result of a waving of a wand? Was it the result of sleight of hand? Was it the result of a policy deliberately followed by the Government of the United States?

Mr. CAPEHART. I wish I had the records before me at the moment so that I might answer the question.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator get the records and put them in the RECORD?

Mr. CAPEHART. Wait a minute, please.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Indiana may have permission to insert in the RECORD an explanation of how the Government accomplished this miracle for the 9-month period to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Indiana now has the unanimous consent of the U.S. Senate to get all the facts at his command and to give to the Senate an explanation of how the Government performed this supposedly impossible feat in a Republican administration of lowering interest rates as an election approached.

Now I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I want to say this. What I said a moment ago was, and I repeat it, that it was the same administration and the same Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. GORE. There is no doubt about that. That is admitted.

Mr. CAPEHART. Wait a minute—that accomplished what you are talking about, and I think they are sincere and conscientious, and I think that if they could sell bonds today at half the interest rates, they would do so. I think I know that they are up against a very, very serious problem, and I want to say this to the Senator from Tennessee, that if we refuse to permit the Government to increase interest rates and the price of Government bonds goes down and down and foreign holders of gold in this country and of bonds become frightened and they withdraw gold from this country as a result of this policy, I say to you that you may have chaos in this country and I do not want to be a party to it. I do not want to so discourage people from buying Government bonds because the interest rate is so low that we will have chaos in this country and get ourselves into a lot of trouble.

Mr. GORE. I recognize that the Senator does not want to be a party——

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GORE. Not just now. I recognize that the Senator does not want to be a party to the policies which the next Democratic administration will inaugurate. I realize that he prefers the present policy, the tight money policy. I realize that he may not be victimized by it, but while he may not suffer from it, while he may not deplore it, millions and millions of people who are being driven out of business and into bankruptcy, who are suffering from this policy, deplore it and do not endorse it.

I wish to quote once again from the article in the Wall Street Journal of yesterday which further describes this situation:

> New York bankers testify that the growing tightness of money extends beyond New York. "Out-of-town banks call upon us continually, wanting us to take a piece of this or that loan."

Says an official of one New York City bank: "We can see the money supply grow tighter as we sit here at the desk."

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I just promised to yield to the junior Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CAPEHART. Do you not prove your own point?

Mr. ANDERSON. When the statement is made that we must have a higher interest rate to induce people to buy bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury wants to increase E- and H-bonds from 3.126 to 3.75. I wonder if he knows the present quotations on Government bonds?

If I were to buy a Government bond which I could cash in at the end of 1 year, instead of buying an E-bond I could buy a Treasury 2⅛ of 1960 at 97.13 yielding 4.31%. If I wanted a 2-year bond, I could get a Treasury 2½ of 1961 priced at 94.28 and get a yield of 4.92%, a terrific yield for a short-term bond.

Would anyone be stupid enough to buy a bond at 3.25 when he can get 4.92?

I remember a businessman who was very sick. He was 75 years old. A friend said to him, "Don't you worry. You will get well. You will be around here when you are 100."

He looked at the friend and he said, "Oh, no. I am a businessman. You are a businessman. God is a businessman. Do you think He will take me for a hundred when He can get me for seventy-five?"

Would anybody take an E-bond for 3.26 when he can get 4.92?

Something must be done other than constantly raising the price of money. The Treasury, as the able Senator from Tennessee pointed out, said the budget was off $500 million because the interest rate was not high enough. If we take the lid off now, it will be off at least a billion dollars next year, and perhaps more. The cost of servicing the national debt increased $2 billion in the past 3 or 4 years.

Mr. GORE. And the cost of building a school, a hospital, a sewer line, a waterworks project is going up and up until it is beyond the reach of many small communities throughout our land.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wonder if the Senator from Tennessee knows that in the last few days there have been indications that the commercial mortgage rate on high-grade commercial properites is up to 5½ percent? I discussed with the head of a very large financial institution just a few days ago what the policy in the future is going to be. He said we will be up to 6 percent before the first of the year, probably by the first of November.

When we jump the interest rate up that far, we place a burden on business, we place a burden on every transaction, we contribute to inflation.

I am glad the Senator from Tennessee is worried about that, because people who own houses or people who are going to have to come in to make new mortgages will be faced with this, and it is a very serious problem.

I do not believe that we are going to be able to sell bonds by granting authority to raise rates on long-range financing.

Mr. GORE. So long as the Government has a policy of pushing interest rate levels higher and higher, who wishes to buy a bond at 4, 4¼, or even 5 when he is on notice that the Government is following a policy to push it below par almost as quickly as it is sold?

Mr. ANDERSON. If he wanted to buy a 10-year bond, he would buy a Treasury 2½ of 1969 with an early maturity of 1964 if he wanted to cash it in. Those are selling at 82 and 16/32s, a yield of 4.71, nearly 4¾ percent on a 10-year bond. Part of it is on a capital gains basis, which makes it very attractive.

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. And those who bought such bonds 1 month ago have already lost money.

Mr. ANDERSON. Exactly.

Mr. GORE. And under this policy those who buy even at the rates which the Senator has quoted will have lost money 60 days from now. How can the Government expect to stabilize interest rates when it has a policy of pushing them higher and higher? What we need in this Government is a determination to put the public welfare first. What we need in this Government is a policy of interest rate stabilization. It can be done. It has been done. It must be done.

I yield now to the——

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I promised to yield to the junior Senator from Colorado. If the Senator will be patient a moment, I yield to the junior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I thought perhaps we could reduce to simple terms some of the definitions. For example, when we refer to a prime rate of interest, we mean, as I understand it, the rate of interest charged the most preferential customer. For example, if a New York bank raises its prime rate of interest to 5 percent, what does this do to the small businessman at home who is not a preferential customer of that bank? The Senator from Tennessee has said that in a year or a year and a half the prime rate of interest has been increased from 3½ to 5 percent.

Mr. GORE. That is within the last year.

Mr. CARROLL. Yes. That is right. How will that reflect itself down to the small businessman in State after State throughout the country?

Mr. GORE. It means in my State higher and higher rates of interest, and it means in New York already a 5-percent prime rate, but this article in the Wall Street Journal says that the banks require those who borrow to keep at least 20 percent of the amount they borrow on deposit, which means that the prime rate is actually 6 percent instead of 5. It means that this increase will be reflected all over the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the gulf to the Canadian border, and it means that every housewife will face the tough problem of making ends meet with her household budget. It means that the cost of living will go higher and higher in coming months.

Mr. CARROLL. That is exactly the point I wished to bring out. Whether the borrower is the automobile dealer at home, or whether people go to the local bank at home, if the preferential customer must pay 5 percent in New York, one can imagine what borrowers will have to pay in the rural and mountain areas of the West. The rate will go to 6, 7, or 8 percent.

I think one of the most important contributions of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee is on this particular question. I have listened with great patience to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and I have a deep concern about Government bonds. I think the Senator from Tennessee has put his finger on the most important point.

According to the statement in the morning newspapers, the New York banks are talking about a tight money policy. If I correctly understand the question of the Senator from Indiana, he says that this is a competitive market.

The next point he made was that our economy is expanding. Three million Americans are being born every year. Are we to have a tighter, more restrictive policy which keeps driving the interest rates up year after year? What will then happen to Government bonds?

If this is a competitive market, what about the supply of money? What about the present fiscal policy, debt management or debt mismanagement? I can understand the deep concern in a period in which redemptions of savings bonds are far outrunning purchases today. That is a serious problem. But we cannot meet it by permitting the bankers to increase their prime rate of interest, and by vesting the Government with authority to try to compete with them in a market which becomes narrower and more restricted under a tight money policy. The principal question is—and I should like to have an answer if we can have it—How are we to increase the supply of money so as to avoid getting into a tight money policy, in which interest rates are driven up and up, not only to the small businessman, but to everyone else? They will be reflected in every refrigerator or automobile that is purchased. If that is not the worst kind of inflation, I would like to know what it is. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to give us some light on that question.

Mr. GORE. The answer of the administration to the problem is to raise interest rates. That does not solve the problem. It makes it worse.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not a fact that increases in the cost of lumber, groceries, and everything else affect the purchaser as much as do interest rates?

The second question I wish to ask——

Mr. GORE. Let me answer the first question. The answer to that is "Yes."

I ask the Senator if the cost of lumber, the cost of the truck that hauls it, and the cost of doing business generally is not increased by higher interest rates, thus reflecting higher prices of commodities?

Mr. CAPEHART. Both factors have an influence. Anything that increases costs, of course, is reflected in the selling price. That is true of interest or anything else.

Mr. GORE. Does it not follow, then, that higher interest rates are inflationary?

Mr. CAPEHART. No more so than the increase in the price of anything else—wages or anything else.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has just said that interest rates contribute to higher prices. I have asked him, therefore, if higher interest rates are not inflationary. Of course they are, by the Senator's own statement. If he will concede that higher prices are the end product of inflation——

Mr. CAPEHART. Anything that increases costs increases selling prices.

Mr. GORE. And that includes interest.

Mr. CAPEHART. It includes interest, wages, and everything else.

I shall be very happy to join with the Senator in curing the situation if he knows how to do it. What is his suggestion? Let us introduce legislation to cure the situation. Will the Senator state for the RECORD exactly what he would do to cure the situation?

Mr. GORE. No legislation is needed. What we need is an administration of present laws and programs in the public interest. No new law is needed. What we need is the administration of the people's government in the people's interest.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is familiar with the fact that the President vetoed the civil works bill the other day, and unfortunately the House lacked one vote of being able to override the veto. As I understand the veto message, the reason for the veto is that the $30 million which had been added is inflationary.

Mr. GORE. Oh, terribly.

Mr. MONRONEY. But the President himself, by directing the Government fiscal policies, has increased the public debt since January by $500 million. Does not the $500 million added to the public debt have a greater impact than the additional $30 million in the civil works bill?

Mr. GORE. Yes. That was the estimate of 60 days ago. It is now more than $500 million.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to make an observation to my good friend from Indiana, with whom I serve on the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The point is that the high interest policy is half unwise and half unnecessary. It is this policy which is creating the chaos of which the Senator from Indiana complains. This policy can and should be changed tomorrow. It could be changed tomorrow by the Federal Reserve Board doing its clear duty, the Treasury Department doing its clear duty, and the President doing his clear duty.

Mr. CAPEHART. What are those three things?

Mr. CLARK. By moving in to support the Government bond market; by stopping all the talk of chaos and scare; by withdrawing the request for an increase in the interest ceiling; and by making the same effort which was made in 1958 to bring down interest rates. It was successful then, and could be successful today.

If the only way Congress can compel the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury to return to monetary sanity is to refuse to yield on the 4½-percent interest ceiling, then I say by all means, let us refuse to yield.

Mr. GORE. It would be not only acting responsibility, but acting in the public interest. Congress has acted in the public interest. I am proud of the refusal of Congress to give approval to the higher interest rate policy, and I shall resist any such effort, whether it comes this year or next year. This disastrous policy must be stopped, and it will be stopped.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In the article by Mr. J. A. Livingston, to which the Senator and I referred a while ago, he asks in conclusion whether the policy of refusing to yield on the interest ceiling is what the American people want. I say it is what they would want if they knew the facts. Mr. Livingston asks, in conclusion:

> Is that what the American people want? Is that what the Democratic leadership is prepared to defend and sponsor?

I say I do not know, but here is one Democrat who thinks it ought to be the policy of the Democratic Party.

Mr. GORE. So far as another Democrat is concerned, it is a policy. It will not be enacted, if I can prevent it.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I think I should make my own position clear, so far as I can, if the Senator will permit a comment preceding the question.

I have a deep concern, as I read the financial pages and try to find out what is going on. There is no doubt in my mind that because of the tight money policy, the money market is drying up. This is happening because of the high interest rate on short-term loans. This is what is affecting Government financing.

Mr. GORE. Yet some claim we have a free money market.

Mr. CARROLL. I do not wish to be too critical of the administration, but I think the Federal Reserve Board should pay attention to what is happening. That is why I commend the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee for his presentation today.

Somehow, in some way—I think the Federal Reserve Board could do it—we must ease up on the tight money policy. A point and a half increase in the prime rate of interest in a 12-month period will be reflected throughout the entire economy of the country. Apply that to the Government bond situation. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that this is a very dangerous financial situation in which we find ourselves. I do not know what we are going to do. We may reach the position of saying, "Perhaps the administration is guilty of debt mismanagement. Perhaps it should have done this, or the Federal Reserve Board should have done that." We may be confronted, not with a theory, not with a criticism of a policy, but with a condition and a problem as to what we shall have to do in the future.

But, as the distinguished Senator from Tennessee has stated, increasing the interest rate is no answer to the problem, because 6 months from now there may be another increase in the interest rate. Then what will happen to Government bonds?

Mr. GORE. There may be another increase in 3 months.

Mr. CARROLL. As I remember, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a breakdown of taxes which are being paid today. If my memory serves me correctly, out of every $100 paid in taxes, almost $10 is now going for payment on the national debt. To me, this is a great danger; it is on the direct road to inflation.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Colorado has used the word "road." I point out that the increased cost of interest on the national debt, above the budget estimates in January, is already more than is needed to bail out from default the highway program, which is now a "must" piece of proposed legislation before Congress.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield further, to permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARROLL. May I have the attention of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; indeed.

Mr. CARROLL. Is there any doubt in the mind of the Senator from Indiana that the present financial condition with respect to interest rates has been brought about because of the lack of an adequate supply of money on the money market? The demand for money is great, I believe the Senator has said.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. If there were a larger supply of money, would that not tend to reduce interest rates, in the normal situation?

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator talks about tight money. I presume the Senator means a scarcity of money. If there is a scarcity of money, it will naturally increase interest rates. If there is only a limited amount of money to be loaned, the people will lend it where they can get the highest rate.

So when the Senator talks about tight money, I presume he is speaking about a scarcity of money.

Mr. CARROLL. I mean both ways. There can be an ample supply of money; but if there is control of the money market, the rate of interest can increase. The next question is whether there is an adequate supply of money to accommodate the expanding economy.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not think the supply at this moment is at the point where the interest rate can be reduced. I think there is a shortage of money at the moment to carry on our expanding economy.

As I said before, the national debt is big; it is the largest in the history of the Nation.

Similarly, the consumer loans, the loans to the people, are the largest in history. The demand on the part of business for loans to carry inventories is the greatest in history, because the inventories are the largest. Today, almost four times as much capital or money is necessary to run either a big business or a little business as was needed 25 years ago, because of the volume of business done and the wages paid. I am not complaining about the wages; I am trying to be factual. More money is required. The result is that that money is competing for an interest rate, and I think rightfully so.

I think the visitors in the galleries, who use their savings to buy E bonds and H bonds or to deposit in savings accounts or to purchase annuities and other forms of savings, are entitled to an increase in their interest rates, because everything they buy, when they go to the markets, costs them more.

I should like to see stability of interest rates, if that could be done. But I also want to encourage people to save money to buy Government bonds, bonds which will carry an adequate rate of interest in comparison with the cost of the things they buy and the interest rates which prevail today, which they can get if they invest in mortgages and other kinds of securities.

Mr. CARROLL. What is the Government doing to insure an adequate money supply?

Mr. CAPEHART. I think it has done a fairly good job, perhaps not as good as we would like to see. But I think it has managed the business fairly well when we consider that the debt is $290 billion and that $80 billion in Government bonds will come due this year to be refinanced.

Mr. CARROLL. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Tennessee further. I thought his very fine remarks today were a highlight which has enabled us to understand the problem in simple terms. I think he has done a remarkable job.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CAPEHART. Let me say, in all fairness, that I think the matter is so serious it ought to be debated. I am against the philosophy of the Senators on the other side of the aisle who have spoken on this subject. Nevertheless, I do appreciate the problem and think we should discuss it and bring it to the attention of the American people, because I think the question ought to be settled one way or the other.

I think the failure of Congress to do something about increasing interest rates will be harmful to the economy. On the other hand, perhaps the administration has failed to do some of the things it might have done. At the moment, I cannot think of anything which they are doing. Perhaps there are some things which it should be doing. I think interest rates on Government bonds ought to be increased, because I am afraid that one of these days the matter will come to a head and will explode. The question, I believe, ought to be settled one way or the other. The best way to settle it is by open debate, as we are doing today.

Mr. GORE. I compliment the able Senator from Indiana upon his candor. I appreciate his willingness to debate the subject. As he said, there are two sides to the coin. He has stated his view of the question, and others, including myself, have stated a different view. Like the Senator from Indiana, I think it is in the public interest to bring to the attention of the people of the United States the problem, the issue, and the danger.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that, in view of what the Senator from Indiana has said, with which I completely agree, it might be interesting to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee and other members of the Committee on Finance—I observe the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] also present—a report which has been made available today by the Committee on Finance, entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States." It is a 140-page analysis of 2,088 pages of testimony on the financial condition of the United States. I do not suppose it will become a bestseller, but it is an extremely important document. I hope this analysis of the problem, together with the testimony, may be studied by Members of the Senate and discussed.

Mr. GORE. Would the Senator identify the document, so that those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and who may wish to write in and order the document may do so?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States—Analysis of Hearings Before the Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, 86th Congress, 1st Session."

There are three chapters. One is an analysis by Dr. James W. Ford, who pretty well supports the position taken by the administration; the next is an analysis by Dr. Seymour E. Harris, chairman of the economics department, Harvard University, who is not quite so sympathetic; the third is a very fine analysis by Senator WALLACE F. BENNETT, of Utah, a member of the Committee on Finance, in which the Senator from Utah includes the text of speeches which he gave upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senate document have a number?

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe not, but it is made available today by the Committee on Finance. The first copies are now coming to the Senate. I think it is interesting that they are coming here at the time when the able Senator from Tennessee has raised this question so forcefully on the floor of the Senate. I am glad he has done so, because I think a discussion of this subject is extremely important. I am not always certain who is right and who is wrong.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think the matter ought to be settled.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think there ought to be a discussion. A subject which is confined to the United States. A similar report has just been made in Great Britain. It has taken 2 or 3 years to complete it. It was made by a committee headed by the Right Honorable Lord Radcliffe, and has been published by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think that in many ways that report is perhaps more interesting than the report of the Committee on Finance. But the committee's document and the Radcliffe report could be the basis for a very serious discussion.

I compliment the Senator from Tennessee for raising the question for the attention of the people.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from New Mexico for his contribution to the discussion. I agree that it is timely and appropriate to call attention to this document. I hope it will receive study by many students of the question.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It might be well to point out some of the places where the high interest rates hit especially hard.

In the case of the purchasers of new homes, I believe the Senator from Tennessee knows that on long-term mortgages, each advance of 1 percent in the interest charged means an advance of 10 percent in the monthly payments.

For example, on a 30-year mortgage, a 2-percent increase in the interest rate—and that much has occurred—means a 20-percent increase in the payments, so that if the monthly payment at 4 percent interest had been $75, the monthly payment would have to be increased to $90 if the interest rate increased to 6 percent.

Mr. GORE. Yes; or even a little more than that.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. And as regards rents, an increase in the interest rates is passed along a little more rapidly, because the rent the landlord can charge is competitive with the monthly payments made by those who are purchasing new houses; and the landlord must borrow money in order to build new rental housing.

Mr. GORE. Let me mention an instance about which I have heard. A person borrowed $30,000 with which to build a home. He borrowed it on a 25-year amortization schedule. The interest rate was 6 percent. When the mortgage was signed, sealed, and delivered, the borrower asked how much more in interest he would have to pay under the contract and the mortgage he had just signed, as compared with what he would have paid if he had borrowed the same amount of money for the same period of time at the rate available before this administration came into power. From the calculator, the borrower obtained the answer—$11,997. That extra payment of $12,000, lacking $3, did not provide any more housing or a larger loan or any other additional benefit to that homeowner and homebuilder. It is only more interest.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I am sure the Senator from Tennessee also realizes that as the cost of new housing rises, it tends to have an adverse effect on the availability of rental housing at reasonable rates. As the landlords have to pay more interest on the money they borrow in order to build new rental housing, that situation tends to make rents rise; and the probability is—and if it has not already happened, it is certainly in the process of happening—that the advance in the interest rate on rental housing construction money from 4 percent to 6 percent means that the rents charged on that rental housing can be expected to increase 20 percent. In other words, rents will be 20 percent higher than they would have been if more reasonable interest rates had been in effect.

If we multiply by 2 percent the public and private debt of approximately $800 billion in this country, we find that the total amount of additional interest payments in the United States in 1 year will thus be increased by approximately $16 billion. Figured on an annual basis, those who owe money will be paying someone else $16 billion more than they would otherwise be paying.

Of course, some of the borrowers are also lenders; but if we reduce that figure by approximately one-third, in order to offset for that factor, we find that, on a per capita basis, the masses of our people will be paying approximately $60 a person additional each year as a tribute to those who control the money markets of the Nation, if the Government does not use its power to protect them.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that that $60 additional a person which is being paid buys nothing more; it does not buy another house or another automobile; it buys nothing but air.

Mr. GORE. Yes. It does not create money. I suppose it succeeds in enabling those who are the beneficiaries to buy more yachts or more penthouses, and makes it possible for them to clip more coupons from tax-exempt securities.

Mr. PROXMIRE. But from the standpoint of the purchasers of new houses, is it not true that that increase in what they have to pay represents the sheerest kind of inflation, in the sense that they receive nothing additional for those additional payments?

Mr. GORE. I thoroughly agree.

Mr. President, the Wall Street Journal for September 1, 1959, carried an article, by Mr. Lee Silberman, in the nature of a roundup of current credit conditions. This article shows quite well some, although not all, of the effects of the tight money policy now being pursued by the U.S. Government.

I wish to emphasize several of the points which are brought out in this article.

First, it is admitted that, since New York banks make some 20 percent of all bank loans to business, these large banks set the pattern for the country. An increase in the "prime" rate charged by these banks will be felt all across the country.

Second, money now is extremely tight. One measure of the tightness of money is the ratio of loans to deposits. At the end of July this ratio was 51 percent nationwide, and up to 60 percent for some big New York banks, the highest since 1933.

Third, higher interest rates would hit retailers and wholesalers very hard at this season, as they are now beginning to build up inventories for fall and winter business. In the end, of course—although Mr. Silberman does not point this out—the extra costs are passed on to the consumers, wherever possible.

Fourth, consumer loan charges will probably advance soon. According to this article, the banks had contemplated raising consumer loan rates earlier during the summer, "but held off when President Eisenhower's proposal to remove the 4¼-percent ceiling on longer term Government bonds stirred protests in Congress against higher interest rates generally." I am glad to note, Mr. President, that those of us who deplore the effects of high interest rates, and who have voiced our feelings, have had some effect, even if only a temporary one, on the business community.

Fifth, major New York banks during the past year have cut their holdings of Government securities from $8 billion to $6 billion. The banks have done this, of course, to raise funds in order to make loans at higher rates of interest, and thus increase their already high earnings.

Sixth, this article contains a very interesting side note on how tight money encourages certain banking practices which I feel border on the unethical. In commenting on the increasing selectivity of bankers and the power of the bankers to decide who will get a loan and who will not, an unidentified banker is quoted as saying, "We now give primary consideration to whether a customer has any call on us—in other words, is he a customer of long standing who keeps up his compensating balances?" The article then goes on to say that banks generally require business borrowers to keep a deposit balance of about 20 percent of their loans. This, of course, increases the real cost of borrowing money by about 1 percent above the apparent, or stated, interest rate.

This unidentified banker is further quoted as saying, "Borrowers who have had no account with us, or just small accounts, are finding it increasingly hard to make the grade." Thus, Mr. President, the bankers can deny necessary financing to the new, small, or weak enterprises.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article, by Mr. Silberman, from the Wall Street Journal for September 1, 1959, be printed at this point in my remarks. I commend it to all who may be interested in the effects and practices associated with the current shameful and hurtful tight money policy being pursued by the Federal Reserve System. This article is most timely, in view of the increase of yesterday in the prime rate.

The article forecasting the increase appeared in the morning paper. The increase occurred before nightfall.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to commend my distinguished colleague from Tennessee for the splendid, forthright, and intelligent speech he has just made on this matter of great national interest, and to assure him of my warm support of his views.

In view of the fact that he and I have been discussing an article entitled "A Matter of Justice to Government Bond Buyers," I wonder if he would have any objection to my seeking unanimous consent to have the article appear at the conclusion of his remarks?

Mr. GORE. I think, in justice to Mr. Livingston, the entire article should appear in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed following the article from the Wall Street Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COSTLIER CREDIT: BUSINESSMEN FACE NEW BANK LOAN RATE BOOST, PERHAPS IN A FEW DAYS—LOANS CLIMB DESPITE STEEL STRIKE—FEDERAL RESERVE KEEPS TIGHT REIN ON FUNDS—A RISE FOR CONSUMERS, TOO?

(By Lee Silberman)

NEW YORK.—Businessmen face another general increase in the cost of bank borrowing—possibly within a matter of days.

That's the word from bankers here in the Nation's financial capital. New York City banks, including such giants as Chase Manhattan Bank, First National City Bank, Morgan Guaranty Trust Co., and Chemical Corn Exchange Bank, account for some 20 percent of all bank loans to business. Their actions set lending patterns for banks the Nation over.

A general interest rate boost would be touched off by an increase in the prime rate—the rate the banks charge their biggest borrowers with the best credit ratings. Rates for all other borrowers are scaled upward from the prime rate. The prime rate was boosted in May from 4 percent to its present 4½ percent level. Another increase probably would lift the rate to 5 percent, the highest point in 28 years.

CLIMATE IS RIGHT

"We're being squeezed for money," says a top lending officer of one major New York bank. "I'd say the climate is right for a rate increase."

New York bankers testify that the growing tightness of money extends beyond New York. "Out-of-town banks call us continuously, wanting us to take a piece of this or that loan," says an official of one New York City bank. "You can see the money supply grow tighter as you sit here at the desk."

Talk of tighter money and higher interest rates may seem a bit strange in the midst of a nationwide steel strike. Steel-using industries borrow heavily to finance steel inventories; in recent weeks, they've been working down their stocks, of course—and paying off part of their loans. But bankers report growing demand from other sources has more than offset the reduction in steel-inventory loans.

As an indication of the growing squeeze on the banks, consider their loan-deposit ratio. At the end of July, loans of the Nation's banks were equal to 51 percent of deposits, the highest point since 1933. For New York City banks, the ratios are even higher, ranging up to 60 percent. And bankers report loan demand still is growing faster than deposits.

RETAILERS AND COMMODITY DEALERS

Higher interest rates would hit hard at retailers and wholesalers, who only now are beginning to step up their borrowing to finance accumulation of inventories for the fall and Christmas selling seasons. Commodity dealers and food processors also are beginning to step up their bank borrowing now to finance purchase of crops.

An increase in business loan rates could lead to higher costs for consumers as well as businessmen. Earlier this summer, some New York City banks were planning to increase their consumer loan charges. They now collect, in advance, a fee of $3.75 a year on each $100 that is borrowed to buy autos and appliances and for other purposes. They were aiming to boost this charge to $4.25 but held off when President Eisenhower's proposal to remove the 4½-percent ceiling on longer term Government bonds stirred protests in Congress against higher interest rates generally.

Banks' consumer loan charges are not geared directly to their business loan rates. But bankers expect their return on consumer loans to keep pace with the returns on their other loans, so rising business loan rates are sure to renew pressure for higher consumer loan charges.

The squeeze on the banks' loanable funds stems from several factors.

First, demand for funds is growing. Business loans of major New York City banks at midweek, for example, last week stood at $9.9 billion, an increase of $187 million since June 30.

Loan demand promises to grow. For one thing, there's the usual seasonal upswing in borrowing by wholesalers, retailers, commodity dealers, and food processors. And bankers report a growing demand for credit from other types of businesses, too.

A SPILLOVER INTO BANKS

With capital spending heading upward again, more companies will be seeking financing. Such projects usually are financed through retained earnings and long-term bond borrowing, but with the continuing weakness of the bond market bankers expect much of this credit demand to spill over into the banks. With bond borrowing costs climbing, many companies prefer to postpone bond sales and rely temporarily on bank loans.

And there's no question bond borrowing costs are rising; in some cases, the rises have been much swifter than market specialists have expected. Last week, for example, underwriters of three issues of high-grade corporate bonds found they had set their prices too high. So, reluctantly, they decided to let the issues find their own price levels in the market.

Late last week, some $2.5 million of a $30 million offering of Michigan Bell Telephone Co. debentures was put on the market in this manner. The debentures, initially priced to yield investors 4.75 percent, quickly fell in price so as to yield 4.9 percent.

"It's natural in times of a falling or unsettled bond market for companies to rely on banks for interim financing, hoping for the market to improve," says an official of a major New York bank. "But if the prime rate went up to, say, 5 percent, more corporations would look to the bond market and banks could concentrate more on their normal types of loans for short-term working capital and inventory needs." Bankers also hope that a prime rate boost would lead more borrowers to postpone least-essential projects and thus ease the credit squeeze a bit.

The bond market, while it has been helping to boost demand for bank loans, has in effect been cutting the banks' supplies of loanable funds. In times of tight money, banks normally sell off Government securities to raise funds. Major New York City banks, for example, in the past year have cut their holdings of Government securities from $8 billion to $6 billion. But with prices of Government securities down, further cuts in many cases would be likely to be painful, forcing the banks to absorb losses.

A more important curb on the banks' supply of loanable funds, however, is the current Federal Reserve System policy. Anxious to prevent an inflationary credit splurge, the system has been keeping a close rein on the funds the banks have available to lend.

The system can increase the funds the banks have available to lend by purchasing Government securities; it pays for its purchases with a check and the seller deposits the check in his bank, thus transferring Federal Reserve funds to the banking system which then has more money to lend. Or the system can cut the banks' loanable funds by selling Government securities; the purchaser draws funds from his bank to pay the Federal Reserve.

A gage of the effectiveness of this policy is the reserve position of the banks. Member banks of the System are required to keep on deposit with the System amounts equal to a specified percentage of the deposits on their own books. The percentage varies from city to city; for major New York banks, it's 18 percent. For several weeks, banks have had to borrow heavily from the System to keep their reserves up to minimum levels. At the close of business last Wednesday, the banks' reserves exceeded requirements by $462 million, but this was more than accounted for by borrowings totaling $940 million.

New York City bankers figure the Reserve System may make a prime rate boost a bit more palatable to their customers. They'd like to time a prime rate increase to coincide with a boost in the System's discount rate—the rate at which it lends to member banks. This rate now stands at 3½ percent.

Many bankers believe the Federal Reserve would prefer to wait until after the steel strike to boost the discount rate again. But it may decide that it can't wait. The discount rate normally is closely related to the yield on new issues of 3-month Treasury bills. Last week, however, the Treasury bill rate climbed considerably above the discount rate, and this week mounted still further to a 26-year high of 3.889 percent. "There's no doubt the situation is ripe for a discount rate move," says a New York banker.

Another New York banker, however, insists that a prime rate boost is imminent whether the discount rate goes up or not. "The pressure is building up at such a rate that some banks may not be in the mood to wait around for the System to act," he says. He recalls that banks last May boosted the prime rate more than a week before the discount rate was lifted.

To conserve their loanable funds, banks are becoming increasingly selective in making loans. "We now give primary consideration to whether a customer has any call on us—in other words, is he a customer of long standing who keeps up his compensating balances?" says one New York banker.

Banks generally require business borrowers to keep on deposit with them amounts equal to about 20 percent of their loans. Such deposits draw no interest and thus increase the actual cost of the loans.

"Borrowers who have had no account with us, or just small accounts," says the New York banker, "are finding it increasingly hard to make the grade."

A MATTER OF JUSTICE TO GOVERNMENT BOND BUYERS

(By J. A. Livingston)

It's late, 11th-hour late, yet not too late for Congress to act responsibly and grant justice to 40 million E- and H-bond holders and other investors in Government bonds.

One of the last things President Eisenhower did before taking off for Europe was to send a special message to the Senate and the House. In nontechnical language, he said: Give Secretary of the Treasury Anderson the power he needs to do his job of handling the national debt. But congressional leaders have put the request in the ho-hum file.

This dalliance takes money out of the pockets of you and me—of anyone who owns an E- or an H-bond. It mocks the efforts of Treasury officials to sell savings bonds and long-term bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury seeks authority to eliminate the interest rate ceiling of 3.26 percent on E- and H-bonds. He wants to pay 3.75 percent on newly sold bonds. When and if the rate goes up, Secretary of the Treasury Anderson intends to increase payments on all E- and H-bonds outstanding by at least one-half percent. In addition, all E- and H-bonds issued at the 3.26 percent rate during June, July, and August will automatically get a boost to 3.75 percent.

The Secretary isn't giving Government money away. The rate has to go up as a practical matter. It ought to go up as a matter of fairness, justice.

REDEMPTIONS ARE HEAVY

Many savings and most savings and loan associations pay as much or better than 3.26 percent. That's why redemptions of savings bonds have exceeded sales in recent months. The present interest rate is competitively too low. Why give the Treasury your savings when you can do better elsewhere?

President Eisenhower also asked Congress to eliminate the present 4¼ percent ceiling on marketable bonds. The House Ways and Means Democrats tacked a rider on this proposal directing the Federal Reserve System, whenever feasible and consistent with sound monetary policy, to purchase Government bonds. "I didn't care one way or another about the amendment," says WILBUR D. MILLS, Democrat, of Arkansas, committee chairman, "but I felt it was necessary for votes."

William McChesney Martin, Jr., Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, argued the amendment would hamper the Board in fighting inflation. Secretary Anderson supported him. The committee thereupon tabled the proposal. The Senate hasn't even considered the plan formally.

Influential Democrats in both Houses oppose higher interest rates. They feel that the Federal Reserve System can buy Government bonds, force interest rates down and, thus, lower the cost of carrying the U.S. debt. This, they say, would make unnecessary a change in the 4¼-percent ceiling on marketable bonds.

WHY THE IMPASSE

To Martin, Anderson, and orthodox monetary theorists, this would make money too easy and too plentiful. That's the impasse. Congress says the Reserve should rescue the Treasury. The administration says Congress should give the Treasury the tools to do it itself.

It seems to me that Congress has a trustee's responsibility to owners of savings bonds who are not "hep" to the ways of finance. They don't understand the intricacies of money rates. It's unfair to keep them locked in bonds paying 3.26 percent and less when rates elsewhere are higher.

Congress also has a practical responsibility—not only in savings bonds but in marketable bonds. If people redeem savings bonds faster than they buy them, then Secretary Anderson has to raise new cash to pay off the redemptionists. Government debt becomes "unfinanced."

AT 83 CENTS ON THE DOLLAR

The 4¼-percent interest-rate ceiling on long-term bonds compels Anderson to sell only short-term securities. Some Government bonds today can be bought at 83 cents on the dollar. Some sell to yield as high as 4.5 percent. So Anderson can't ask investors, bankers, insurance companies, investment trusts to buy 4¼-percent bonds—securities maturing in more than 5 years. Like the 3.26-percent ceiling on savings bonds, the 4¼-percent rate on marketable bonds is obsolete and noncompetitive.

For Congress to adjourn without acting on the interest rates would be irresponsible. It would justify President Eisenhower's calling a special session. When the Treasury has no alternative but to sell strictly short-term securities, it is putting out the closest thing possible to irredeemable paper money.

Is that what the American people want? Is that what the Democratic leadership is prepared to defend and sponsor?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In connection with the Senator's remarks, it occurs to me this might be an appropriate place to insert in the RECORD a statement I had prepared showing the annual average rate of interest on offerings of public marketable securities other than regular Treasury weekly bills, from 1929 to 1959.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement and table appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LONG OF LOUISIANA

I have asked the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to prepare for me a table showing the average annual rate of interest on offerings of public marketable securities other than regular Treasury weekly bills from 1929 through 1959. In view of the current proposal of the administration that Congress increase the ceiling on Treasury long-term bonds, I think that a study of this table is appropriate at this time.

Since 1952 these interest rates have increased from approximately 2 percent to over 3¼ percent. This is due to the deliberate tight-money, high-interest-rate policy of the present administration. You will note that the general trend of higher interest rates was halted in 1958 when our country suffered a sharp economic decline. It is my feeling that, in some measure, this recession was due to the tight-money policy which can only be effective in curbing inflation if it curtails economic activity.

During 1957 when the average rate on these securities had risen to almost 3.7 percent from its level of 2.025 percent in 1952, the cost of industry borrowing and consumer borrowing had risen to such an extent that economic activity was sharply curtailed.

I would like to comment parenthetically that I noticed yesterday that the Treasury had to pay its highest price in 26 years to borrow money for 90 days.

The Democrats have traditionally been the party of low interest rates. I think this table demonstrates that this assertion is justified.

When President Roosevelt was sworn in in 1933, this interest rate was over 3 percent. In 1934 it had declined to less than 2½ percent and it stayed under 2 percent almost every year until 1952. In the immediate postwar years, this interest rate was below 1 percent.

Mr. President, I think that this table is an interesting study for the Members of this body and I commend it to their attention. Under unanimous consent, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the table which I had prepared entitled "Annual Average Rate of Interest on Offerings of Public Marketable Securities Other Than Regular Treasury Weekly Bills, 1929–59":

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

OPPOSITION TO INVITATION TO KHRUSHCHEV TO ADDRESS A JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, each day brings another newspaper editorial or congressional speech urging that Khrushchev be invited to address a joint session of Congress during his visit.

Those who a few weeks ago were assuring us that the Khrushchev visit implied no honor or tribute to him and what he represents are now attempting to broaden the scope of his welcome in ways that can only imply just that.

An invitation to Khrushchev to address a joint session of Congress, or either branch of Congress, is an honor, a tribute, and a token of approval which there is no gainsaying.

My attitude toward the Khrushchev visit to this country is already in the RECORD and I see no need to repeat it. In my previous speech, I tried to point out why I believe that the arguments advanced for bringing Khrushchev to this country are either superficial or specious.

But even if these arguments for the visit were valid, they would have no validity whatever when applied to the question of Khrushchev's addressing a joint session of Congress.

A Khrushchev appearance before Congress could not further negotiations for peace. It could not really add to his knowledge of the United States. It could not impress upon him the strength of our country. It could not serve to give him any real knowledge of how our people live or how our Government functions.

It could not add appreciably to the ample opportunity for increased "understanding," already offered Khrushchev by our television and press coverage.

An invitation to a foreign leader to address Congress is a ceremonial honor, pure and simple. To extend it to Khrushchev is a needless, shameless, purposeless affront to our free parliamentary traditions extending over almost two centuries.

Perhaps only those who have attended joint sessions of Congress can perceive the full significance of such an invitation.

If such a ceremony ever takes place, it will bring out the entire top level of our three branches of Government to do honor to Khrushchev.

One Senator has suggested that the President of the United States be on hand to introduce Khrushchev with appropriate warmth.

The Supreme Court Justices in their black robes, the members of the Cabinet, the full membership of the House of Representatives and the Senate, and the world's leading diplomats will all be on hand to rise and to applaud Khrushchev as he marches down the center aisle of the House Chamber and ascends to the rostrum heretofore reserved for spokesmen for freedom.

And the same "courtesy" which moves so many to advocate at Khrushchev joint session of Congress would presumably also move the assembled representatives of our Nation to applaud the Communist propaganda of his speech.

And I suppose that at the end of an hour or two of falsehood, misrepresentation, and fraud, courtesy will again demand that we applaud Khrushchev's performance and rise in a final tribute to him as he leaves the Chamber.

Such a picture to me seems almost too fantastic and incredible to imagine in a free world of sane and rational men.

Despite the repeated protestations that no dishonor or shame would be involved in such proceedings, I can interpret them in no other way.

I would not have believed such a thing possible had not influential Members of Congress and respected organs of the press advocated it.

So far as I have been able to follow this matter, three reasons have been brought forth in favor of Khrushchev's appearance at a joint session.

The first is that it would be an act of discourtesy not to invite him.

In the few short weeks since the invitation was announced, the meaning of the word "courtesy" has undergone a strange metamorphosis.

In the days immediately following the announcement, courtesy quite properly meant refraining from insults, jeers or egg-throwing. A week or two later, courtesy came to preclude even boycotts, peaceful picketing or merely the ignoring of Khrushchev.

And now we are told courtesy demands that we not only refrain from any show of unpleasantness or even inattention, but that we extend to Khrushchev the greatest public honor we can bestow upon any visiting chief of state, an invitation to address Congress.

Perhaps tomorrow we shall be told by the editorial writers and exchange enthusiasts that in the name of courtesy we must cheer Khrushchev, laugh at his homely stories, and put on a real demonstration of warmth and affection for this arch criminal.

The second reason advanced in favor of a Khrushchev joint session is the obscure and fuzzy notion that it is desirable in order to enable the Members of Congress to observe Khrushchev at close range, reading his prepared speech in his native tongue, and thus to gain a better understanding of him.

The congressional Chamber is apparently to be turned into some sort of laboratory or zoo where the Members can study the creature at close range, gain some deep insight into his character and presumably emerge from the experience with an enhanced understanding of world affairs.

This argumentation represented in my judgment a low point in the history of tortured logic until I heard the third reason, which surely carries off the prize.

It is held by some legislators that the sight of Congress assembled in the House Chamber will, in some mysterious manner, impress upon Khrushchev the strength of this country and the worth and vitality of our free institutions.

There is an unconscious vanity and an ironic humor in this attitude of Senators and Representatives which should not be lost upon the contingent in the press gallery and which should bring out the best satiric efforts of our cartoonists.

The more one reflects upon the idea that the sight of Congress will impress Khrushchev, the more absurd it becomes. In some unexplained manner, the sight of several hundred men sitting on the floor of Congress listening to Khrushchev's speech is expected to convey an impression of strength and vigor.

Khrushchev knows what he is and what he has done. He knows the calculated distortions and misrepresentations abounding in his speeches for our consumption. He knows of his own plans for subjugating our people.

Will he therefore be impressed by the sight of our leaders receiving his misrepresentations with cordiality and applause? Or will our friendliness give him an impression of weakness, of stupidity, of lambs ready for the slaughter?

It may be that Khrushchev will detect in the strong visages and impressive deportment of our Senators and Representatives some deep repository of wisdom and strength which will increase his respect for our country and its institutions. But I venture to say that if he does, he will be evincing an insight more profound and penetrating than that of many who have visited these halls.

For it is not in outward appearances that the strength and worth of Congress lie. These can be found only in the long web of tradition, the struggle to fulfill the goals of our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution, the quest for and the defense of freedom, the slow but constant attempts to perfect our system of free institutions, the enduring vigor and vitality of the elective process, the attitudes, traditions and concepts developed in two centuries of trying to keep faith with the democratic ideal.

Are we preserving those traditions, are we keeping faith with those ideals if we say now that a Khrushchev is as welcome here as a Churchill?

Supporters of the Khrushchev invitation to address Congress will say to me, "Everything you say about Khrushchev may be true, and everything you say about freedom may be true, but it is all beside the point. It gets us nowhere in this situation."

Mr. President, it is not beside the point. It is the point.

Arnold Toynbee has said that a civilization begins to fall when it begins to lose contact with the origins of its greatness.

Are we not losing contact with the origins of our greatness when strange notions of courtesy to Communist dictators are more important than old values and codes of conduct? If the origins of our greatness are to be found in the love of liberty, in a contagious idealism, in an approach to national and world problems based on religious convictions and moral principles, then we cannot succeed with mores that are so sophisticated, so tolerant of evil, that we will permit, if only for an hour, the enthronement in our Capitol of the human embodiment of tyranny.

The leaders of free people cannot, like so many pawnbrokers, trim their values to suit each shifting demand of expediency. We cannot trade in our basic convictions and attitudes in return for a fanciful code of diplomatic etiquette.

Somewhere the line must be drawn. Somewhere there must remain an inviolable and undefiled temple of our democracy and our civilization within which tyrants are not permitted. That temple should be this Capitol of the United States, this citadel of freedom, this symbol of democracy, this monument not alone of stone and steel, but of the words, the hopes, the sacrifices of a free people.

Mr. President, not a single precedent for inviting Khrushchev to address the Congress can be found anywhere in our history. Congress must not be hurried, without sufficient reflection, into mocking its past.

My understanding is that a joint session could be arranged in either of the following ways:

It could be brought about by the leadership of both Houses without a joint resolution, without debate, and without any expression of the will of the membership.

Or it could be brought about by the passage of a joint resolution which is normally done perfunctorily, by unanimous consent, but which technically is debatable and which can be brought to a record vote.

Some Senators have served notice that if a joint session is not arranged they would favor a Khrushchev session of the Senate alone and at least one resolution to that effect has already been promised, a resolution which would be debatable and which could be brought to a vote.

I have written to our distinguished majority leader asking that any Khrushchev invitation to address Congress be presented to the entire membership for action. I have asked that before any unanimous-consent request is made concerning such an invitation I be notified so that I could be on hand to object, to insist upon a debate, and, with the help of my colleagues, to bring about an expression of the will of each Senator on this question through a recorded vote.

We all share in the prerogatives and powers of this body. We all share in the responsibility for its actions. If this Congress is to submit to having its rostrum used as a forum for a murderer, an assassin, and a tyrant, then such an act should represent the expressed will, not just of the leaders, but of the entire membership.

I do not presume to be a spokesman for the honor, the traditions, and the ideals of this Congress. Surely, when such an invitation is brought before this body, revered and elder Members who love the Senate and all that it represents will rise to speak out against its defilement.

Surely one by one my colleagues will rise to swell the chorus of opposition to a Khrushchev performance in this Congress.

Surely the Congress of the United States will, in the end, etch indelibly over its portals the inscription, "Only friends of freedom may enter here."

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, at the outset may I extend my commendation and my admiration to the distinguished and able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] for the remarks he has made. May I also say that I am in complete accord with everything that he has stated.

Without a doubt, Mr. Khrushchev is a good politician in and expert on the Soviet Union, but there is not a thing he can tell the Congress, and not one of us in interested in listening to any of his harangues. We have, unfortunately, heard of too many of them already.

As the distinguished Senator from Connecticut so ably stated, the privilege of appearing before a joint session of Congress should certainly be reserved for Americans of distinction and achievement, for a visiting chief of state, and for the heads of friendly governments. Khrushchev does not come within any of those categories. He is not the head of a friendly nation. He is not a chief of state. He is not a man of distinction and achievement in this country, and the invitation is extended only to persons in one of those categories, plus, of course, the President of the United States.

We want no part of Khrushchev in the Halls of Congress. On the other hand, the Senator from Connecticut and I agree that as he comes to this country as a guest of the President of the United States, he should be treated with dignity and with courtesy.

We want him to go throughout the land. We want him to see the broad expanse of this Nation. We want him to visit our great industrial cities. There are many such cities, including my home city of Cleveland, Ohio. There, recent immigrants from the old world, first generation Americans, and men and women of various and diverse ethnic origins—of Italian, Slovak, Greek, Russian, Czech, and Polish descent—live in peace, friendliness, comfort, and mutual respect.

We want Mr. Khrushchev to see these things. Perhaps he will have sense enough and prudence enough—although I have grave doubts on that subject—after seeing the expanse of our country and the might of America, and judging the determination and the might of a great free people like ourselves, to go back to the Soviet Union and take a new look, and make a reappraisal of some of dastardly things he has had to say and the misconceptions he has of America.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my friend from Connecticut may yield to me with the understanding that he will not lose his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I am not sure I heard the unanimous-consent request. What was the request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That the Senator from Connecticut may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Senators present and, through the aides of the Senate, those who are not on the floor at the moment, that the distinguished minority leader informs me the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the other members of the conference committee have reached an agreement in the conference, and I think that perhaps 13 of the 14 conferees—perhaps only 12 of the 14—will sign the report on the labor bill. It is expected the report will be presented today.

I am informed by the Parliamentarian that as soon as the report is presented, if it is agreeable to the members of both sides of the aisle, and if they are willing to discuss it, we can take it up without it going over for a day, by motion. I am also informed that it would be agreeable to the minority leadership to have the report discussed as late as 12 o'clock this evening.

Under the order previously entered we will meet at 11 a.m. tomorrow. Perhaps we could hope for a vote sometime then.

I simply want the Members to be on notice. I am informed that agreement has been reached in the conference committee, and we will be prepared to consider the conference report as soon as the chairman of the conference is ready to present it. The Senate will act first.

I am also informed that the Appropriations Committee of the House is meeting at 4:30 this afternoon to consider the action it should take on the public works appropriation bill. We can look for prompt action in the House in connection with that matter.

The conference committee either has agreed or is about to agree on the military construction appropriation bill. We would expect to present that conference report, which will have high priority.

I say all of these things while the aides of the Senate are under instructions to inquire as to the wishes of the Members of the Senate, as to whether we should be in session on Saturday and on Monday. If the majority of the Members of the Senate feel that they can be present during those days, and we can run late and keep our discussion at a minimum, it is very possible that we could conclude the session at a reasonably early date.

It looks now as if the mutual security bill, the labor bill—whatever action may have to be taken in connection with the housing bill—the public works appropriation bill, the civil rights bill, and any other bills could be taken up by motion at the proper time.

So I hope all Members will try to arrange their engagements so as to be here during the next few weeks, so that we can conclude action on these measures. I particularly wanted to give as much advance notice on the labor conference report as possible.

Mr. DIRKSEN rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I fully concur in the desire of the majority leader to secure expeditious action on the conference report.

We have been actually engaged in conference 12 or 13 days—perhaps longer, as a matter of fact—and as one of the conferees, I am quite happy over the fact that we could compose our differences and come in with an agreed report. I see my distinguished friend from Michigan and other Senators are present. The sooner it is expedited for action I think the better it will be, and of course it will be in the interest of expeditious adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I want to commend the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the able minority leader, and all their colleagues on both sides of the aisle, who worked so long, so diligently, and so faithfully in connection with this very difficult subject.

I am informed that there was one Member of each body who did not sign the conference report—that 12 or 13 of the 14 voted for it. I think that is a fine testimonial of the very effective efforts of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], of the minority leader, of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and of others who worked so diligently.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. It seems to me, if the majority leader will pay attention, in view of the fact that the conferees have labored so long, and we have been laboring here, that we ought to try to recess at a reasonable hour tonight, and have an understanding to that effect. If the explanations are not satisfactory they can go over until tomorrow. It seems to me that if the majority leader, who has been always, let us say, so willing to agree to matters of this kind, will agree that we could leave at, say, 6:30 or 7:30 tonight, and go over until 11 o'clock in the morning, we could have a full explanation and understand what the differences of those two Members were.

I am informed, though I would not say that I have it confirmed, that there is one of the Members who did not sign the report who threatened to talk for hours. If that is so, I think we ought to have the speech in the morning and not have it tonight, when although Senators are not tired, they are a little bit exhausted. I am sure the minority leader looks as if he has been "pulled through a knothole" or something of that kind—tired and worn.

I make the point that that is what we ought to do, in the interest of quickly getting rid of the matters before us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator for his point.

Mr. WILEY. Is that all I get?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I talked to the Senator's leader at some length. We await the pleasure of the chairman of the conference and the other members.

I always try to be reasonable. Last night we got out of here at 5:30 or 6 o'clock.

Mr. WILEY. It was a quarter of 7.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The night before, at the Senator's suggestion, we got out of here at a reasonable hour, 6 o'clock.

We are in the last days of the session. I do not know how long Senators wish to discuss this matter. I should like to have more information from them before I make a final decision. When I make a commitment I keep it, but I do not want to make one at this time.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the majority leader and other Senators on procedural points be printed after my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR ENTIRE STAFF OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE TO BE ON FLOOR DURING CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON LABOR BILL

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the rule relating to the number of staff members who may be on the floor at one time would permit only one member of the minority staff of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to be present during the consideration of the conference report on the labor bill. Because of the very unusual nature of the conference report and the circumstances which surround it, I ask unanimous consent that the entire staff of the committee may be permitted to be on the floor during the time when the conference report on the labor bill is discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SURVEY OF PROPOSED OREGON DUNES NATIONAL SEASHORE RECREATION AREA BY ROBERT W. CHANDLER, OF THE BEND (OREG.) BULLETIN

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, nationwide interest attaches to the effort on the part of certain Members of the Senate to preserve scenic portions of the country's shoreline in national seashore recreation areas under the supervision of the U.S. National Park Service.

The pages of the RECORD have recently contained extensive speeches on such proposed parks by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], and by many other leaders in the field of conservation of our outdoor grandeur. These have been outstanding speeches.

Looming large in any proposed legislation for the national seashore recreation areas is the Oregon Dunes and Sea Lion Caves National Seashore, along the magnificent seacoast of my native State. Indeed, this area has been recommended for national park status by the National Park Service Advisory Board of the Interior Department. Because I concur thoroughly in this recommendation, I have introduced legislation to transmit the proposal into law. I have had encouragement in my efforts from the administration through the Department of the Interior.

For all these reasons, I believe Members of the Senate will be interested in a most illuminating series of articles which appeared in the Bend (Oreg.) Bulletin from August 24 until August 27, 1959, by Robert W. Chandler, editor of that daily newspaper. Although he himself resides in an inland community, Mr. Chandler journeyed to the Oregon coast to ascertain personally the facts about the proposed national seashore recreation area.

I will let Mr. Chandler's thorough series of four articles speak for itself. However, I am immensely heartened and encouraged by the concluding sentence in his fourth article. It reads as follows:

> Among those who fully understand the facts, support for the park can be found in a sizable majority.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the four articles on the proposed Oregon Dunes National Seashore Recreation Area written by Robert W. Chandler, of the Bend Bulletin.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DUNES PROPOSAL CREATES STIR IN OREGON; SIDES CHOOSE UP FOR CONGRESSIONAL FIGHT—HERE ARE FACTS IN COAST PARK CONTROVERSY

(EDITOR'S NOTE: In March this year the National Park Service reported results of a yearlong survey of recreation areas on the Pacific coast. Included in recommendations accompanying the survey was one that an area between Florence and Reedsport on the Oregon coast, plus Oregon's Sea Lion Caves, be set aside as a national recreation area. The proposal has been the subject of considerable discussion, within and without the area, since that time. The editor of the Bend Bulletin recently spent several days in the area, looking over the proposal and discussing it with proponents and opponents. His findings are presented in a series of articles, the first of which follows.)

(By Robert W. Chandler)

REEDSPORT, OREG.—Come to this Oregon city where the Umpqua River runs into the Pacific and you will hear considerable mention of the park or the national park.

Ask what's going on, and you will receive a number of answers. Some of them demonstrate a pretty thorough lack of familiarity with the whole subject.

For the national park is, strictly speaking, not a national park at all. At present it's a strip of land of varying widths in the area between Reedsport and Florence, 23 miles to the north.

An advisory board to the National Park Service has recommended it be acquired—along with the Sea Lion Caves 12 miles north of Florence, for the Oregon Coast National Seashore Recreation Area.

What is such an area? Are there any in Oregon now? What do people here think of the proposal? How are such areas created?

It was to answer these and other questions that I have just spent time, effort, and gasoline looking over the area.

The official description of the tentative area involved—which could be changed in some details after hearings to be held in the area in October by committees of both the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives—is:

LOCATION

The sand dunes extend for a distance of 23 miles south of Florence. The Sea Lion Caves area is 12 miles north of Florence.

ACCESSIBILITY

The coast highway (U.S. 101) passes through or is adjacent to the entire area.

DESCRIPTION OF AREA

The area comprises 24 miles of shoreline with over 33,000 acres of upland. This includes three distinct types of land forms. Fronting the ocean is an attractive, clean, fine-textured, wide, sandy beach. Second is a vast, desertlike expanse of moving sand that has been swept up from the shore by the wind and subsequently deposited and formed into attractive dunes. The third and easternmost type of land form is ancient, forest-covered dunes which reach a maximum height of 450 feet above the sea. Also included are three irregular, freshwater lakes which possess high scenic and recreation values. They vary greatly in size, ranging from 130-acre Cleawox Lake, the smallest, to Woahink Lake with slightly less than 800 acres, and Siltcoos Lake, which covers some 3,200 acres. Vegetative cover is comprised of a dense, picturesque coniferous forest with an understory of varied shrubs and a fine rhododendron display. The Sea Lion Caves site is a notable rookery for Steller sea lions, California sea lions, and bird life of outstanding interest.

PRESENT USE

Present use consists almost solely of recreation. The area includes one 522-acre State park, and there are several developed forest service campgrounds and picnic areas. A considerable number of homes and cottages exist around the lakes. The Sea Lion Caves section is managed on a private commercial basis.

ANALYSIS

The area is adjudged to be of national importance, not only for the manifold opportunities for seashore recreation but also for the inspirational worth of the resources to the American citizen. The many superlative values found here are of such high importance as to warrant permanent preservation for the Nation as a whole.

Involved is an area of approximately 33,000 acres, about 60 percent of which already is federally owned. Biggest single chunk remaining, about 3,000 acres, is part of the Lake Tahwenitch tree farm of the Crown Zellerbach Corp., and is logged-over land on which the firm is raising pulpwood.

The balance is in some 25 or more—no one seems to know just for sure how many—private ownerships, some of them summer homes, others permanent homes around the lakes in the area, and a few small farms.

When the proposal first was announced, three Oregon Members of Congress, Senators RICHARD L. NEUBERGER and WAYNE MORSE and Congressman CHARLES O. PORTER, announced they would support the Park Service proposal. Bills have been introduced in Congress for this purpose.

Hearings on Senate measures will be held by NEUBERGER in Reedsport, October 5, and Eugene, October 7. A tour of the area will be held on October 6. PORTER will conduct hearings late in October in Florence for the House committee involved.

No sooner had the proposal been publicly announced than the storm broke.

Everyone, it seemed to readers of the area's newspapers, had an immediate opinion on the idea. Some were for it, and some violently opposed the whole thing.

Opinions were not confined to the area, either. Oregon's Gov. Mark Hatfield, after an hour-long telephone conference with NEUBERGER, said he thought the idea a good one. Newspapers joined up. Tours of the area were arranged.

Attempts were made by both sides to get the Florence Chamber of Commerce to state a position. Opinion among chamber members is divided, so the chamber is standing by for the present. A new organization, the Western Lane Taxpayer's Association was formed, to fight the proposal.

Newspapers were flooded with propaganda, from both sides.

One group said the recreation area would be the saving of the Florence-Reedsport area, which has not shared to date in the industrial development of recent years along the Oregon coast.

Another said it would be the ruination of the area, that schools would go broke, retired persons would be shoved out of their homes, property would go off tax rolls, and that any administration under the National Park Service would result in permanent industrial stagnation of the area.

Where does the truth lie, with the opponents or those who favor the development? Which group is right?

Of course, in any proposal as big as this one, there is no single answer. There is no absolute truth, no single set of facts.

On the whole, though, the weight of the evidence favors the development under the plan of the Park Service, it seems to me.

FIGHT AGAINST COAST PARK AREA BEING LED BY TAXPAYER'S GROUP

(By Robert W. Chandler)

FLORENCE, Oreg.—One might think that the idea of a new national recreation area here—which would have the effect of putting Florence on the Nation's maps in a more prominent position than it now holds—would be universally popular.

'Tain't so, brother.

This is not to say the idea is universally unpopular, either. Although opponents are far more vocal than those who favor the idea, one would be mistaken if he felt everyone here and in the proposal area is against the idea.

Who is leading the well-publicized fight against the proposal of the National Park Service that a portion of the area between here and Reedsport, 23 miles to the south, be set aside as National Seashore Recreation Area?

The main opposition seems to come from the newly formed Western Lane Taxpayer's Association. The association, led from Florence, has dredged up all the help it can get, including a couple of industries and the remnants of a tribe of Indians.

HANDOUTS BY SCORE

Most vocal of the leaders are John S. Parker and Jack Hayes, who have been writing handouts by the score, sending letters to the editors of newspapers in and beyond the area and engaging in other activities one finds common to any longer organized pressure group.

They are doing a professional job, too. They are seizing upon every straw in the wind which can help put across their point of view.

What are their objections?

Well, these pieces were not intended to be mere recitals of the positions of various groups. In traveling through the area I tried to talk to persons who had no particular ax to grind, one way or the other. I didn't therefore, feel it necessary to tour the area with Mr. Parker or Mr. Hayes, but instead spent my time talking to others in the area who might not already be committed on the proposal.

One in this business has no trouble, however, finding out the position of the Western Lane Taxpayer's Association. It's ag'in the whole idea.

Prominent in the opposition are real estate interests, which have made a good thing out of lakeside properties around three lakes in the area.

There are those, too, who feel there is considerable industrial future in the area, industrial future which they fear will be limited if companies are unable to use water found in the dunes.

There are those who fear the loss of taxes by local school districts.

There are those who dislike Government encroachment in any form, here or elsewhere.

PROPOSAL OPPOSED

There are large corporations operating in the general area, Crown-Zellerbach and International Paper, both of whom have gone on record as opposing the idea.

There as those engaged in the motel business who feel the State already is making it too easy for persons to camp out along the beach in the summer, and who fear the Federal Government will make it even easier in the future.

And there are a heck of a lot of people who are against the proposal without knowing why.

This last is no real surprise, of course. Too often Americans, including but not limited to newspapermen, make up their minds, with little or no real information.

And the publicity job done by the opposition has been an excellent one, from their point of view.

But, like every professional publicity job of this sort, the Western Lane Taxpayer's Association has not attempted to present the proposal fairly or to give both sides of the picture.

This is not surprising, either. They're against the idea, and they're trying to sell their position to others.

Some of the objections are strictly matters of opinion. One can argue them all day and all night and not find an answer at the end.

Others, however, can either be refuted or proved.

OBJECTIONS NOT SPECIFIC

International Paper has not made a very specific objection. Its local general manager issued a statement last April which was a formal protest because of the general language and broad terms of the Neuberger enabling act, and the lack of time to study its consequences.

Crown-Zellerbach was more specific. The proposal would remove about one-third of the acreage from its local tree farm, and like any other large timber owner it doesn't want to lose any productive acreage.

The Crown-Zellerbach objection has largely fallen on deaf ears, though. The company does no processing here. Whatever is cut from its tree farm will go to some Crown plant in another area, anyway. Total employment of the Crown operation here is estimated at 10–12 persons, at sometime in the indefinite future.

The objection from International is much more worrying to many local people. At Gardiner, near Reedsport, International has a sawmill and plywood plant. It has been making noises about putting in a pulp plant—a big one, too—in Oregon. Reedsport people hope the plant will be located in this area, but if such a decision has been reached it isn't generally known here.

BASIS OF OBJECTIONS

International's objection, at any rate, is based upon a water supply and effluent disposal problem, since no company lands or timber are involved in the proposal.

These objections seem to be entered merely on the record, however, since effluent disposal from a Gardiner pulp operation would probably not involve the seashore area, and Park Service officials seem to be kindly disposed toward the use of industrial water from the dunes, such as is proposed by Pacific Power & Light and Menasha Wooden Ware near North Bend.

Other objections seem in large part to be due to a lack of information on the exact proposal. There is considerable misinformation, some of it due to deliberate distortions and other the natural result of stories passing from person to person.

Don't, however, count out the Western Lane Taxpayers' Association. The group is well organized, skillfully led and well financed.

Lesser groups have caused fatal illnesses to similar proposals elsewhere in the past.

PARK PROPOSAL COULD RESULT IN MUCH GOOD TO STATE COAST AREA

(By Robert W. Chandler)

FLORENCE, OREG.—If there's so much opposition to the proposal to make part of the area between here and Reedsport into a national seashore recreation area, there must be something wrong with the idea. Is there anything good about it?

Well, unless the whole thing is handled very carefully by both the National Park Service, which would have charge of the new facility, and local people, there would be something wrong with the idea. At the same time, there are some very good things about it.

In the first place, this area of the Oregon coast—between the Umpqua and Siuslaw Rivers—has been bypassed by the big industrial boom which has been enjoyed at Coos Bay to the south and Yaquina Bay to the north.

BYPASS SEEN

And because of various geographic factors, it is highly likely that the boom will bypass this area for a number of years to come.

The area originally was built through harvests of timber and salmon. Salmon runs have decreased greatly over the years, and much timber has been cut off. There is stiffer competition for the logs which are left.

So, during recent years the coast—like many other parts of Oregon—has worked hard to improve its tourist business.

After all, a dollar is a dollar, whether it comes from a millhand or the fat man in the Bermuda shorts.

And the coast has done a good job. The care and feeding of tourists now is the second largest source of income for the area, and bids fair to beat out the lumber industry if present trends continue.

MORE CAMPGROUNDS

Others have helped out. Oregon has located about one-third of its State parks in the area between the Columbia River and the California border south of Brookings. U.S. Forest Service public campgrounds are growing in number and size.

Honeyman State Park, located just south of this town, is one of the State's finest. It will hold 1,400 campers. It's full early in the day on holidays and fills up fairly regularly all summer long.

Sea Lion Caves, located north of here and also scheduled to become a part of the national recreation area, caters to thousands of persons each year. For 65 cents, adult, and 25 cents, child, you can climb down a trail and look at the sea lions in their cave. Coming out, when you are out of breath, you can buy souvenirs—at least most visitors seem to do so.

The owners of the caves are sitting pretty in all this business. They figure that if the Federal Government doesn't buy them out, the State will. And in the meantime, presumably, the price keeps going up.

Presumably, too, if this area is to be purchased by the Federal Government and made into a national recreation area, cooler heads will prevail, and some of the heat which has been created by the Western Lane Taxpayer's Association will cool off.

WHAT TO EXPECT

What then could the area expect if such a program were started?

Well, a gradual development would ensue. The Government, according to National Park Service personnel, would take full advantage of existing facilities to handle the crowds at first. Things would begin to move faster after a 2- or 3-year planning period.

Second, homeowners in the area would have lifetime tenancy of the homes they sell to the Government. So the population change would be very gradual.

Third, homes and concessions would remain on the tax rolls. So the effect, if any, on local school districts, for example, would be slow. What else could be expected?

There is at present only one national seashore recreation area operating in the United States. Congressman CHARLES O. PORTER, of this district, recently visited it, at Cape Hatteras, N.C.

PORTER was quite impressed with the whole area.

The NPS has constructed a museum of the sea in the area, has a crew of naturalists and rangers on hand to explain various things to visitors. The State of North Carolina is building a $3 million bridge to open up a new portion of the area.

What about the tourist, that fellow who's so important down here?

Well, judging from Cape Hatteras figures and those of other NSP-administered areas, the already booming Oregon coast tourist industry would boom even more. Tourism is increasing all over the country, but the Park Service can show that areas under their control are showing considerably bigger increases than the average.

ANOTHER PROBLEM

The great dunes themselves have created yet another problem. For they are on the move, although there is some argument as to how much they are moving. Dunes control work has been carried on by the Soil Conservation Service and the State Highway Department in recent years.

Perhaps the most important factor, to this area, of the whole proposal is that it would put the Florence-Reedsport area on the national map in a big way.

The area at present has not enjoyed the tourist growth of the area to the north, or the industrial development of the area to the south. Severe competition for timber supplies in the future probably will keep any big-scale industrial development limited to companies presently operating in the area.

And the care and feeding of tourists, apparently, can continue to promote the growth of the area where nothing else can.

VISITORS ASSURED

The pressure of population, growing in this country at an increasing rate, and the fact that there's something fascinating about the moving, booming sea and its moving shore, will insure more visitors to Oregon beaches in the future.

California, the colossus to the south, has not handled its beaches as wisely as has Oregon. The inevitable result will be to push Californians northward during the summer seasons.

There are reasons, then, good reasons, for establishing such an area here.

What do the people here think about it?

Well, some of them have changed their minds since the proposal first was announced. And the opinion seems to vary depending upon the location of the person holding the opinion.

[From the Bend Bulletin, Aug. 27, 1959]

OPPOSITION TO DUNES PLAN FOUND TO CENTER IN FLORENCE AREA

(By Robert W. Chandler)

REEDPORT, OREG.—What do residents of the area think of the idea of having a national seashore recreation area established between here and Florence?

Well, if one were to inform himself solely by reading the results of a well-organized "letter to the editor" campaign, he would think everyone is against the idea.

That's not true.

Actually, most of the opposition comes from the Florence area. And it's changing there. In addition, not everyone in Florence, by any means, is against the idea.

When the National Park Service proposal first was announced in March, reaction was immediate.

Dave Holman, editor of the Florence News Advertiser, told a reporter at that time that "opinion on the proposal is fairly evenly divided."

But the other day he told this reporter that "85 percent of the people in the area are against the park idea."

Holman has joined the ranks of the opponents of the park in the meantime, and it is probable that this has colored his measurement of the opinions of others.

RAPID FALLOUT

Actually, opposition dies out fairly rapidly beginning at the Florence city limits. By the time one gets to the other end of the area, down here, the idea is fairly popular. Drive further south, to North Bend or Coos Bay, and most people favor it. The same seems true further north, around Waldport or Newport.

It would be a mistake, however, to think that even the most vocal opponents are against the whole idea.

Even opponents agree that the area west of Highway 101 through the area has its greatest value to this area as a tourist attraction. The controversy arises largely over the shorelines of the three freshwater lakes in the area, all on the east side of the highway.

Opposition from around the lakes seems to come in large part from persons holding property for eventual speculative development, from those with low value properties hoping to sell at some future time at a big profit and from some resort operators who are fearful their operations will not come up to National Park Service standards.

But the idea that everyone in the area is up in arms against the proposal is patently untrue. As a matter of fact, were it not for the fears of economic reprisal from their more vocal neighbors, a survey of public opinion in the area between the Siuslaw and Umpqua would probably show the majority favoring the recreation area development.

CONCLUSIONS DRAWN

After spending 2 or 3 days in the area, talking to the people, not their leaders, one comes to these conclusions:

1. The opposition is a small, but well organized and highly vocal, minority.

2. The opposition is centered in Florence, and dies out pretty rapidly as one travels north or south from that city.

3. Most of the balance of the opposition is based on lack of information, or misinformation deliberately fostered by the Lane County Taxpayers Association.

This is not to say that all those in favor of the idea favor it unreservedly. There is a considerable body of opinion which wants the tentative boundaries changed.

At the same time, a number of those who want the boundaries changed don't have a very good idea of just where the boundaries are.

FROM POCKETBOOKS

Most of the milder opponents will admit frankly that their opposition arises solely from their pocketbooks.

The same is true of some of those who want the development, who see in it a chance to better their own economic status some time in the future.

Take, for example, the Florence housewife who came to the door in answer to a knock.

"I don't want to see it come in here. My husband is a logger, and if they shut up all that timber he'll be out of work."

Fact: There's no merchantable timber in the area tentatively proposed, and no loggers are operating there now on any scale.

Or listen to the Reedsport businessman, over a cup of coffee.

"We've got a chance for a big development by International Paper here. If this thing is going to take all their water and timber, we won't have any development."

Fact: International Paper lands are not involved, and their water filings are on a lake not included in the tentative boundaries.

As the Reedsport housewife said, bandaging a scraped knee for her 6-year-old:

TAXES TOO HIGH

"I'm afraid it'll raise taxes, and our taxes are too high already."

Fact: Reedsport taxes are among the highest in the State, but none of the proposed recreation area is within the boundaries of any Reedsport taxing district, so could have no effect here.

There are those who are quite favorably impressed with the whole idea. Many of these are oldtimers in the area, who have gone through 30 or 40 years of false hopes of "big developments" just around the corner.

One grocer put it this way:

"I've lived here a long time. I know the property involved. I've walked and jeeped my way over every foot of it. For the most part it has very low property values, and putting it into any kind of national development would be the highest use to which the property could be put."

Summing up, one would believe that a pretty fair majority of people in this entire area favor the development, with the main opposition coming from a group in Florence. The opposition is less vocal outside the Florence area, and is only effective there because most persons seem to fear economic reprisals.

So, those who approve of the idea may be frightened into silence, and others may be just unwilling to argue publicly with their neighbors, but there are proponents. Among those who fully understand the facts, support for the park can be found in a sizable majority.

"OUR FIRST RESPONSIBILITY"—ANNUAL ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the annual address of the president of the American Bar Association entitled "Our First Responsibility." The address was delivered by one of the Nation's top lawyers, Ross L. Malone, at the 82d annual meeting of the association, recently held in Miami, Fla. It is an excellent speech and one which deserves the thoughtful consideration of all of us.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR FIRST RESPONSIBILITY

(The annual address of the president of the American Bar Association by Ross L. Malone before the opening assembly of the 82d annual meeting of the American Bar Association, Americana Hotel, Miami Beach, Fla., August 24, 1959)

Many years after the close of his remarkable career, a contemporary of Simeon E. Baldwin described the founder of the American Bar Association as "the man who has done more to elevate the general standard of legal education than any other person in this country, and who was the projector and progenitor of the entire system of graduate law instruction in the United States."

Whether or not the author of that statement was attributing to the former chief justice and Governor of Connecticut the accomplishments of the organization of which he was the founder, and later president, there was a sound basis for his statement.

It would have been surprising if Simeon Baldwin's great interest in legal education had not been reflected in the organization which he had conceived. It would have been even more surprising if the national organization of the legal profession had not evidenced throughout its history a major concern for the educational process by which its members are prepared to serve the public.

Whether this interest be attributed to the influence of heredity or environment, there can be no question but that legal education has been a source of continuing concern to the American Bar Association throughout the 81 years of its existence. Examination of the history of the association furnishes convincing evidence that traditionally it has been recognized as our first responsibility.

The constitution adopted by our founders at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., on August 21, 1878, stated the first object of the new association to be "to advance the science of jurisprudence." Of the seven committees originally created by the constitution, one was "on legal education and admissions to the bar."

Following completion of the organizational formalities, the first resolution offered and adopted at the first meeting of the association was:

"Resolved, That the committee on legal education and admissions to the bar be instructed to report, at the ensuing annual meeting, some plan for assimilating throughout the Union the requirements of candidates for admission to the bar, and for regulating on principles of comity, the standing throughout the Union, of gentlemen already admitted to practice in their own States."

Subsequent developments continued the priority which the founders had given to legal education. As the membership and size of the annual meetings of the association increased, the program became more crowded. Those interested in the problems of legal education felt that the general meetings of the association did not afford adequate time for their discussions. The demands for the allotment of additional time on the program led the executive committee of the association in 1893 to propose a resolution to create a section of legal education and admissions to the bar. The motion to adopt the resolution was made by Simeon E. Baldwin of Connecticut, and there resulted another "first" for legal education—the first section to be created by the association. It is worthy of note that it has since been joined by 17 additional sections which will meet during this 82d annual meeting of the association.

Since its inception, the association has sought to elevate the standards of legal education. In 1879, at a time when no State in the Union required education in a law school for admission to the bar, the committee on legal education filed its first report recommending that a law school education be made a prerequisite of the right to take the bar examination. It recommended in detail the curricula which should be pursued during the 3 years of law school which it proposed. While the association was unwilling to take such a big step so early in its life, it did approve a 3 year law course, graduation from which would entitle a student to take the bar examination, and recommended that time spent in the law school be treated as equal to law office study in qualifying to take the bar examination.

Through the years the proceedings of the annual meetings of the association evidence the interest of its members in the educational requirements for the practice of law. The names of Woodrow Wilson, Samuel Williston, John H. Wigmore, John Randolph Tucker, William Draper Lewis, James Barr Ames, Roscoe Pound, Harlan F. Stone, William H. Taft, Silas H. Strawn, Elihu Root, and others of comparable distinction which appear in the proceedings of the section, testify to the predominant position of legal education in the program of the association through the years.

At the annual meeting in 1899 a committee of the section was appointed to "take into consideration what action, if any, shall be taken to bring the reputable law schools of the country into closer relations with each other and with the section of legal education." There resulted in 1900 the organization of the Association of American Law Schools, the membership of which was composed of law schools meeting the minimum standards of the association. It met annually in conjunction with the annual meeting of the American Bar Association until 1914. In that year the association met in October—at a time when it was obviously impossible for most law teachers to attend. This resulted in a decision of the Association of American Law Schools to meet separately from the association, and since 1914 there has not been a joint meeting of this association and the Association of American Law Schools.

The most significant action of this association affecting legal education occurred in 1921. In his address as president of the American Bar Association in 1916, Elihu Root had dscussed at some length the problems of the bar in relation to legal education, premising his discussion on the proposition that if the legal profession is to discharge adequately its obligation to the public, it must terminate the production of incompetent lawyers by marginal law schools through elevating the standards of education and the requirements for admission to the bar.

Mr. Root concluded:

"The law school has taken the place of the law office, except for acquiring the mere technique of practice, and the rights of the people of the United States to have an effective administration of the law require that the standards of the best law schools shall be applied to determine the right to membership in the bar."

Elihu Root's eloquent plea for the elevation of the standards of legal education, and his interest in the subject, undoubtedly resulted in his being elected, and accepting, the chairmanship of the section of legal education and admissions to the bar in 1920. At that meeting the new chairman was authorized to appoint a seven-member committee, of which he would be chairman, "to report to the next annual meeting of the section their recommendations in respect to what, if any, action shall be taken by this section and by the American Bar Association to create conditions which will tend to strengthen the character and improve the efficiency of persons to be admitted to the practice of law."

The report filed by the committee in 1921 has been characterized as "one of the milestones in the evolution of legal education." The accompanying resolutions proposed to put the American Bar Association on record as being of the opinion that every candidate for admission to the bar should have graduated from a law school requiring 2 years of prelaw college study and 3 years of full-time study in law school, or its equivalent.

The resolutions further put the association on record as favoring bar examinations and opposing the diploma privilege, and authorized the council of the section of legal education to publish the names of schools meeting the standards so adopted, as well as the names of those which did not, and to make such publications available to "intending" law students.

The resolutions then authorized the council on legal education to call a conference on legal education, in the name of the American Bar Association, to which State and local bar associations would be invited to send delegates, which would, it was hoped, take action to "create conditions favorable to the adoption of the principles set forth."

The proposed resolutions were debated fully and were adopted by the section, and the following day by the association. This action, which in a large measure reflected the leadership of Elihu Root, has been referred to by Dean Albert J. Harno as "the most articulate and positive action on legal education ever taken in America."

The national conference which followed convened in Washington, D.C., in February 1922. Forty-four State bar associations, over 100 local bar associations, two Canadian bar associations, and a number of universities were represented in the conference which was composed of 560 delegates. Included among the speakers at the conference were William Howard Taft, then Chief Justice of the United States, Elihu Root, George W. Wickersham, John W. Davis, William G. McAdoo, George Wharton Pepper, Silas H. Strawn, and other leaders of the profession.

Debate on the resolutions continued for 2 days. There was a thorough "airing" of the John Marshall and Abraham Lincoln arguments as opposed to the position of Mr. Root that the right of the public to be protected against ignorance and unfitness within the bar must be predominant. On final vote the substitute motions which had been offered in an effort to "water down" the proposal of the association were defeated and the original resolutions were adopted.

This was the origin of the inspection and accrediting of law schools by the American Bar Association and of the establishment of standards of legal education on the basis of which the right to accreditation would be determined.

It is doubtful if this association has ever taken action which had a more far-reaching effect upon the legal profession or its relationship with the public. Had the association never accomplished anything more than the adoption of the resolutions in 1921, implemented by the national conference in 1922 and the system of inspection and approval of law schools which has followed, the existence of the American Bar Association would have been fully justified.

As a further backdrop for the discussion of some current problems of legal education, I should mention the creation of the National Conference of Bar Examiners in 1931, the inception shortly thereafter of the program of continuing legal education under the aegis of the secton on legal education; the creation of the joint American Law Institute-American Bar Association committee on continuing Legal Education in 1947; and the increase from 2 to 3 years of the prelaw education requirement in 1950. All reflect the appreciation by the legal profession of the importance of its responsibility for the qualification of lawyers to render service to the public and our continuing determination that the bar as a whole shall measure up to commensurate standards.

One other product of the association's interest in legal education should be mentioned. It is the survey of the legal profession, which was undertaken in 1947.

In 1944 the section of legal education received from the house of delegates authority to conduct an overall study of legal education and admissions to the bar in the public interest. On pursuing the matter, the section concluded that if the study of legal education was to be really worth while, it should be a part of a much broader study of the profession as a whole. On recommendation of the house of delegates, approval was forthcoming and a comprehensive survey of the legal profession was undertaken, to be financed by a grant of $100,000 from the Carnegie Corp., and $50,000 which the association obligated itself to provide.

Only the final report of the survey remains to be completed. As foretold by the original conception of the project, legal education was the subject of special attention throughout the survey. The two major publications of the survey dealing with legal education are the excellent study and report of Dean Albert J. Harno, entitled "Legal Education in the United States," which has been of great assistance in the preparation of this address, and the volume "The Law Schools of the United States," by Lowell S. Nicholson of Boston. The latter volume, published during the last year, is a statistical study of information concerning the law schools of the United States based on answers to a comprehensive questionnaire issued by the survey.

In the light of the history of the association which I have recounted, and the predominant concern for legal education which it discloses, I would like to consider three specific problems which are pointed up by the survey of the legal profession. Each is a problem relating directly to legal education; each is a problem in the solution of which the entire profession has a vital interest. They are:

1. The relation of prelaw education to the law school.

2. The necessity for more adequate education for professional responsibility.

3. The inadequacy of the financial support for legal education.

Any examination of problems relating to legal education must be made in the light of the separate maintenance agreed on by the American Bar Association and the Association of American Law Schools in 1914. An inevitable result of this physical separation has been loss of contact between the two organizations and a tendency on the part of each to regard the other with something less than complete approval. In the same manner, as the teaching of law became established as a profession in itself, the law teacher and the practitioner have tended to drift apart. Too often the practitioner regards the educator as a lawyer who couldn't make a living in the practice. The law teacher, in return, regards the practitioner as an embodiment of all the deficiencies of the profession, who is primarily responsible for the disillusionment of the students in whom he is seeking to inculcate high professional standards.

This unfortunate situation has contributed to an attitude in the practicing profession which can be expressed as: "You educate them and we will worry about them after they have passed the bar examination." But that is too late for the worry to start if the interest of the profession as a whole is to be served.

The conditions which determine the quality of the product of the law schools are susceptible of improvement in many respects through the joint effort of the teaching and practicing branches of the profession. Each can assist the other in the solution of vexing problems that should concern the entire profession. A rapprochement between the two is much to be desired. It is an essential ingredient of any adequate solution of the problems under consideration. Perhaps the American Bar Association, after returning the hospitality of our English brothers in 1960, should invite the Association of American Law Schools to meet jointly with us in 1961 to strengthen our bonds with still another segment of the English-speaking bar.

The relationship of prelegal education to the law school is one of the most pressing problems of legal education today. It was the subject of a definitive study by Chief Justice Arthur T. Vanderbilt for the survey of the legal profession and is treated at length by Dean Harno in his report. It is not a new problem. In 1900 William Draper Lewis addressed the section of legal education on the subject "The Proper Preparation for the Study of Law," and it has been discussed ever since. A committee of the Association of American Law Schools was established to deal with the subject in 1950. In 1953 its report "Pre-Legal Education: A Statement of Policy by the Association of American Law Schools" was adopted and distributed. The established policy of the association as reflected in that statement is that under no circumstances shall any college course be required as a prerequisite for admission to law school. It does discuss the general subject matter and character of instruction which are considered desirable, but it does not translate this discussion into prelaw courses. It is directed to the faculty and not to the student level.

That this report has not provided the solution to the problem is apparent from the fact that all educators agree that students are reaching law school with inadequate preparation and many law schools have prepared individual statements on the subject for distribution to prelaw students. Everyone who has studied the situation has concluded that the means whereby prospective lawyers can be assured maximum benefit from their prelaw education is one of the greatest needs of legal education today. Neither legal educators nor practitioners are in agreement as between themselves or with each other as to how best to meet the need.

Dean Harno, reporting for the survey, points out that we say to the student that he must have 3 years of prelegal education, but exercise absolutely no control whatever as to the content of that education. Pointing his accusation equally at the American Bar Association and at the law schools, he said:

"Neither the authority that established the requirement, nor the schools, excepting in the sporadic actions of some schools, offer the student guidance in the path he should follow. Why, as a measure of educational policy, does he not have that guidance?"

At the law school of the University of Michigan in June there was held the 1959 Conference on Legal Education. The conferees, approximately 100 in number, included leaders in legal education from throughout the United States, deans of undergraduate colleges and a small number of representatives of industry and the practicing profession. The portion of the conference in which I was able to participate was interesting, stimulating, and most worthwhile.

It was generally recognized by the conferees that a pressing current problem results from the fact that the legal profession is not attracting the share of outstanding and highly gifted students that it has in times past. More than one undergraduate dean attributed that fact, in part, to the complete lack of an organized undergraduate program for students intending to enter law school. They pointed out that the student is told, in effect, "the law school will accept 3 years of anything so long as your grades are satisfactory."

The deans further said that too often the result is either 3 years of courses in which it is easy to make satisfactory grades or that the student, lacking adequate guidance from the law, becomes interested in some other career during his undergraduate days and is lost to the law.

Recognizing the fact that the profession has not yet arrived at a satisfactory means of taking maximum advantage of the period of prelegal education, the conferees at Ann Arbor, in their final statement, said:

"We recommend that the Association of American Law Schools arrange for the appointment of a working committee consisting of an equal number of law teachers and undergraduate college administrators and teachers, selected from the Association of American Colleges Committee on Pre-Professional Education and the Conference of Academic Deans. The committee should be broadly charged with exploring methods of providing more effective use of the post high school study period as it relates to legal education."

The statement further recommends that when the committee has reported, a full-fledged conference should be called to consider prelegal education, pointing out that it would logically follow the Arden House Conference on Continuing Legal Education and the Ann Arbor Conference on Legal Education.

The proposal is an excellent one, which I hope will be carried out—with one modification. The practicing profession should have equal representation on the committee. It has a stake in the maximum utility of prelegal education and should be able to contribute to the deliberations of such a committee and to the conference which is envisaged. I hope that when the committee is created, an equal number of practicing lawyers representing the American Bar Association will be included in its membership. That the practicing profession was not included in the original proposal is further evidence of the extent to which legal education and the practicing profession have become isolated from each other and tend to consider common problems separately.

There are, however, encouraging evidences of a rapprochement. Continuing legal education provides one. As the result of the highly successful Arden House Conference on Continuing Education of the Bar, an expanded and accelerated program of post-admission legal education is developing in which the law schools and the practicing profession are working in closer cooperation than ever before. This cooperation is being implemented in many States through the creation of a State coordinating committee, as recommended by the Arden House conferees, on which the organized bar, the law schools and all other groups actively interested in continuing legal education are represented. In some States professional directors of continuing legal education are being provided through the joint effort of the law school and the State bar. Undoubtedly this relationship in postadmission education will continue to contribute to a closer relationship between the bar and the law schools which will be mutually beneficial.

The second problem which I wish to consider also is in an area in which educators have been unable to agree. It concerns legal education for professional responsibility.

The final statement of the conferees at the Arden House Conference on Continuing Education of the Bar included this statement:

"Programs for continuing legal education thus far have placed a major emphasis on professional competence and have not given to professional responsibility the attention it should have. In the future these programs must also emphasize the professional responsibilities of the lawyer."

I suggest that the same statement can be made accurately with reference to law school education as it now exists throughout the United States, and that in the future more emphasis must be given in the law schools also to education for professional responsibility. I further suggest that the present situation is sufficiently unsatisfactory to call for immediate action by the Association of American Law Schools and the American Bar Association to insure this additional emphasis.

The study of this subject made by Prof. Elliott E. Cheathem for the survey of the legal profession finds the attention given to professional responsibility in the law schools to be at best wavering and uncertain, and notes widespread confusion in the law schools as to what is expected of them and as to how the instruction can be undertaken effectively.

The report of the Committee of the Association of American Law Schools on Education for Professional Responsibility filed at the annual meeting of the association last December discloses that of 110 accredited member law schools to which this question was directed:

"Does your school offer a course directed primarily to the communication of a perception of professional ethics and responsibility?"

Only 64—less than half—answered in the affirmative and not all of their courses were compulsory.

On this basis we can only conclude that more than one-half of the students graduating from the accredited law schools of the country today have not been exposed to any course or program designed for the purpose of instilling in the student a knowledge and appreciation of the ethical standards and professional responsibility of the profession.

I can only view this as a most regrettable situation. Certainly it is a situation in which the practicing profession has a primary interest for it is only after graduating that the effect of this deficiency will be evident.

I do not want to be misunderstood. The fact that in a law school there is no assigned responsibility of a faculty member for instruction in professional responsibility does not necessarily indicate any lack of appreciation of the importance of instilling professional responsibility in the students. A great many educators have concluded that it is not possible to teach legal ethics or instill professional responsibility through a program of instruction, and that the most effective means of indoctrination is through the contact which students have with professors of high ethical standards who, from time to time, emphasize ethical considerations in connection with the consideration of substantive law questions.

Unquestionably there is great benefit incident to such contacts, but is this not an incidental benefit of attendance at an accredited law school which was one of the reasons that correspondence schools are not accredited? And if it is an incidental benefit, are we justified in relying upon the incidental to provide the essential?

If education for professional responsibility is as vital as the Arden House conferees considered it, and if the lack of uniformity and confusion among the law schools is as great as the survey report and the Association of American Law Schools committee report indicate, it would seem that the time has come for both the Association of American Law Schools and this association to take steps to insure adequate education for professional responsibility in all accredited law schools. This could be done by making such instruction a prerequisite for approval of the law school, just as we make 3 years of prelegal study a prerequisite.

I am certain that those who would oppose such a proposal will suggest that since there is no agreement as to exactly how such instruction can best be undertaken, there is no basis on which a requirement could be promulgated. But I note one requirement among our present standards of accreditation which reads as follows:

"It shall be a school which in the judgment of the council possesses reasonably adequate facilities and maintains a sound education policy."

It would seem that such a requirement in relation to education for professional responsibility should be possible which would permit wide latitude in the approach to the problem but still give impetus to the inclusion of instruction in this area in the law school curriculums. I know of no subject of instruction which exceeds—or even equals—professional responsibility in importance to the profession or to the public.

No one would attribute the current disciplinary problems of the profession to the failure of over half of our schools to include education in ethics and professional concepts in their curriculums, but it would not be surprising if it has contributed to them. This is particularly true when I consider a conversation which I had recently with the chairman of a State bar disciplinary committee. He said that his committee had just completed a hearing on a complaint against a young lawyer, out of law school only about a year, who was in trouble because he didn't know what was expected of him. The chairman was satisfied that this actually was the case. Yet, absent any attempt at instruction as to what the canons of ethics require of a lawyer, what is to prevent such cases occurring?

If it can be said that inability or failure to solve the two problems which I have mentioned reflects no credit upon the law schools, in the case of the third problem "the shoe is on the other foot." The practicing profession has cause for acute embarrassment in the financial problems of our law schools and the manner in which we have ignored them.

The study of the law schools reported by the survey of the legal profession this year discloses a distressing financial situation in the majority of our accredited law schools. It exists not only in relation to the finances of the law schools themselves, but perhaps to an even greater extent in relation to law student loan funds and scholarships.

"By their salaries shall ye know them," wrote one law school inspector for the survey of the legal profession. If that be the criterion, there are a number of our accredited law schools that are not going to be very well known.

There are two basic problems. The first is well stated in the report of the committee which surveyed the 15 law schools in California under the auspices of the State bar of California:

"The argument has been repeatedly made by other departments of the university that there is no reason why a law school professor should be paid any more than a professor of French or English or chemistry or agriculture. This argument is a wholly fallacious one, and one which the organized bar as well as the law schools must effectively combat in the public interest."

Obviously the organized bar is in a much more favorable position to meet this argument than the law faculty involved—but in too few cases have we taken up the cudgels in behalf of our brothers of the teaching profession. By the same token, in the case of the law schools of tax supported institutions, the organized bar of the State is in a far stronger position to assure adequate appropriations for the law school than is the dean, but how often has the bar come to his assistance?

The report of the California survey committee to which I have referred silhouetted the problem when it said:

"The law schools in California, in common with the law schools throughout the United States, are suffering from financial starvation and have been from the time of their organization. Vast sums of money have been made available for education and research in medicine and in various scientific fields, but practically none has been provided for the education of the bar or research into those problems of social and legal engineering with which the legal profession has a public duty to deal."

The survey report includes the following statement by the adviser to the council of the section on legal education of this association:

"Without doubt, the inadequate and low salary scales which obtain in 85 law schools have been harmful to the output of the schools. Nevertheless, the national accrediting agencies have done little about it. Each dean has been left to his own resources in dealing with the problem. The accrediting agencies should tackle the problem."

I propose that we do so—not alone through support of of the type which I have mentioned, but through other means as well. A fund of the type established by the medical and dental professions in support of their professional schools throughout the country offers a possible means of so doing.

In 1948, as a result of efforts of the American Medical Association, the large medical schools of the country and various industrial enterprises, the national fund for medical education was created to mobilize private financial support for the Nation's 82 accredited medical schools. Last year the fund received $2 million from business concerns and $1 million from a matching grant of the Ford Foundation. Out of this fund a grant of $60 per medical student was made to the medical schools of the country.

In 1950 the medical profession established an additional instrumentality, the national fund for medical education. It obtains funds almost entirely from contributions by members of the profession themselves. Its 1958 contributions exceeded $1 million from over 44,000 doctor contributors. Doctors contributing are at liberty to earmark funds for their alma maters if they desire to do so, otherwise all funds are divided equally among the accredited schools.

Approximately 1 year ago the dental profession created the fund for dental education, which is designed to obtain support for dental schools from both outside sources and contributions by members of the profession.

It is inconceivable to me that the members of the legal profession would be less interested in supporting professional education than would the members of the medical and dental professions. We should proceed without delay in the formulation and implementation of a program to provide additional financial support for the law schools of the country. The interest of the public which we serve demands that we do so. The findings of the survey of the legal profession demand that we do so. Our professional self-respect demands that we do so.

May I conclude by reminding you that it is not by chance that legal education is the first responsibility of the profession. To a greater extent than any other agency or activity of the profession, the law schools determine the caliber of the lawyers who will compose the profession and the quality of service that they will render. They are entitled to the support and assistance of the remainder of the profession at all times.

The three problems which I have mentioned today are problems of the profession as a whole. The solution of each will come through a common effort dictated by our common interest. In finding those solutions the legal profession will be recognizing once more its first responsibility.

FACING THE FACTS ON CIVIL DEFENSE

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the story of a nation's decline has always been in one way or another the story of its unwillingness to face reality. The American people should be told the truth about our muddled, befuddled civil defense program.

The taxpayers of this Nation should not be lulled into a maginot line feeling of security about civil defense at a time when millions of their tax dollars are being spent to perpetuate a boondoggling, superannuated civil defense agency.

Our people whose homes and lives are threatened should know the truth—the cold hard facts of survival in a nuclear war—and we as their elected representatives are dutybound to provide them with a sane, sound, realistic civil defense program instead of subaverage planners drawing big salaries to head up the present outfit.

After almost 10 years of civil defense planning, the Government's capability to protect the population of the United States is even more ineffective than when it began. It is time that we face the issue of survival in the thermonuclear age squarely and take realistic steps toward doing something about it.

ROCKEFELLER'S HIDEAWAY

Lately, we have been hearing a lot about basement and backyard shelter programs. The distinguished Governor of New York has proposed a compulsory program of this sort for the people of his State. From his recent statements, it appears that he would like to use his not inconsiderable influence to foist this plan on all Americans.

The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has just issued a report based on hearings held earlier this year. It is interesting to note that in the event of an all-out nuclear attack, 50 percent of the existing dwellings in the United States would be so severely damaged or contaminated by fallout to the extent that they would not be usable for at least several months, many for years.

A shallow basement shelter would be of no use in target areas where the blast and thermal effects would virtually destroy all existing buildings and account for 75 percent of the casualties. Only 25 percent of all fatalities would result from fallout and the Rockefeller's hideaway would be of little protection except perhaps in some places remote from target areas. Even then they would be of little use. In New York State, for instance, there would be virtually no areas clear of serious radiation in a nuclear attack on primary targets.

I assert that these shallow shelters would be no more effective than lying flat on one's face or falling on one's knees in prayer. I am confident that the efficacy of prayer would be far greater.

Still, Governor Rockefeller persists in his drive to force another noble experiment—the last being prohibition—on the people of his State. I seriously doubt that they will accept it, and if it is forced upon them whether it will give them any greater degree of security in an atomic war.

In my own State of Ohio, I know of no civil defense official who, himself, has taken the trouble to build such a shelter, either in his backyard or in his basement. Yet many of them have endorsed the Rockefeller proposals and urged such a program for Ohioans. On being questioned by newspaper reporters, for one reason or another, they admitted that not one of them has erected a civil defense shelter in his own backyard or basement, although they have endorsed the program of Governor Rockefeller. Of course, we all know that in urban areas a small civil defense shelter in the basement of a home might indeed prove to be a firetrap. Evidently the civil defense officials, who recommend these shelters but do not have one themselves, are aware of this fact.

RUN, HIDE, OR BOTH?

It is a tragic joke that while these officials preach the shelter sermon which they themselves do not practice, they are at the same time issuing evacuation instructions. Are we to run or hide or do both at the same time?

I wish to differentiate between these civil defense officials and the very fine volunteer civil defense workers, who have really made sacrifices. In a time of flood in Ohio, early this year, for instance, not one paid civil defense official made any sacrifice whatever, but unfortunately two civil defense volunteers, unpaid workers, gave their lives, and others were injured in rendering first aid to injured people.

Last Monday while I was in Cleveland I heard the civil defense siren at noon. It sounds at 12:15 regularly every Monday, to the annoyance of the people of my home city, and without doing any good whatever. I venture to say that there are very, very few, if any, Clevelanders who would have any notion of what to do if these sirens were used in a nuclear attack.

In Columbus these officials released a 4½-pound, 2-inch-thick manual for evacuation in a nuclear attack. If one took the trouble to read it—and I venture that not 1 in 5,000 residents of Columbus has—he will learn that he is to hop in his car and leave by the shortest route immediately upon receiving the attack warning.

Can any reasonable person imagine all of the automobiles in Columbus, a city of half a million people, trying to leave the city at one time? Even assuming ample warning time which there of course will not be, the chaos would be unbelievable and would probably produce as many casualties as the bomb or missile itself.

Anyway, there is no reason why Columbus should be a target of any missile from the Soviet Union. There are no missile installations at Columbus. It is true that at times during the year the General Assembly of Ohio meets in Columbus, which is the capital city of my State. Many years ago I was a member of the General Assembly of Ohio. I am proud that the citizens of that State elected me.

Yet, as a devout Christian, may I say that in the event of a nuclear attack upon this country by the Soviet Union, in which any missile, accidentally or by design should strike within a reasonable radius of the city of Columbus, Ohio, while the general assembly is in session, let us have faith and confidence that should some of the legislators of my State be killed, divine providence will come to the rescue of our beloved country and of my beloved State to fill those vacant chairs. I believe He would.

Mr. President, the truth is that the theory of evacuation in this day and age is not only silly but dangerous. Soviet submarines off our coasts could send rockets with nuclear warheads 1,500 miles or more inland with accuracy and we would be lucky to have 5 minutes warning.

Intercontinental ballistic missiles fired from the Soviet Union itself would perhaps allow us 15 to 20 minutes warning time. It is absurd to even consider the possibilities of evacuation under these circumstances.

The thermonuclear weapon with its tremendous destructive power and the missile with its great speed have now made evacuation not only impractical, but impossible.

Yet the high salaried civil defense officials sit in their lush offices busily planning for the evacuation of our cities.

It is almost impossible to believe, but it is a fact that at this late date civil defense officials are issuing plans and directives for evacuation. It is for this confused, outdated agency that American taxpayers have spent nearly $1 billion during the last 9 years.

TWENTY BILLION DOLLAR GAMBLE

Mr. President, the truth is that neither evacuation nor the makeshift shallow basement shelter has any validity in modern warfare. The hard truth is that a system of adequate shelters to minimize casualties will cost the Nation at least $20 billion. Even then there is no assurance that these shelters would not be outmoded before their completion by more advanced weapons or that they would offer any protection against an attack even more deadly than a nuclear attack—biological warfare.

It is high time that we stop kidding ourselves and the American people any longer. Either we take the calculated gamble of spending over $20 billion, or else we should rid the Nation of the present boondoggling agency which specializes in foolhardy schemes to lull the Nation into a sense of fake security.

I refer to the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, which specializes in this pastime.

The present expenditure of millions each year is nothing more than a futile gesture to fool ourselves into thinking that something is being done about civil defense. If we really want to face the issue squarely, we should quit wasting taxpayers' money on the bureaucratic monstrosity we now have and take steps toward adopting a realistic civil defense program.

The defense of the people of the country, of the civilians of the United States, is a part of the defense of the Nation; it is a part of the defense of the United States of America. A unified armed force of the Nation should have charge of such protection.

MORE ROOM AT THE PUBLIC TROUGH

The latest proposal of the high-salaried boondogglers charged with the defense of our civilian populace is a request for $12 million more this year for matching funds to pay the salaries of State and local civil defense officials. This is an increase in the demands of the civil defense agency in order that they may add more civilian employees who will wear armbands and more civil defense workers to act as pap suckers, feeding at the public trough, and doing nothing worthwhile in return for the money they will receive from the taxpayers.

It may not save any more lives in event of attack, but it certainly will add 4,000 more jobs in city halls and county courthouses throughout the land. It will assuredly expand and encourage a lethargic bureaucracy that has already sent almost a billion dollars down the drain of political expediency.

While the Nation hears of a possible 60 million deaths in a nuclear attack, of 50 percent of the Nation's dwellings destroyed, and of other statistics too horrible to contemplate, the civil defense planners come up with a proposal to provide more jobs at the public trough. This is certainly dynamic, farseeing, original thinking.

It is my sincere hope that the House of Representatives will withstand the tremendous pressure from the thousands already on the gravy train, including former Gov. Leo Hoegh, of Iowa, who upon being defeated for reelection as Governor of Iowa was rewarded by the President with appointment to the $22,500 job as head of the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, to the Governor of New York and the President himself, and to grant the $12 million appropriation. If such an amount is granted, then thousands of more useless employees will be added to the civil defense organization.

The Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization is not only geared to the preatomic age, but is wasteful and is forever trying to expand its bureaucratic tentacles. On all its levels it has become a haven for defeated politicians and political patronage. And that goes for my State of Ohio, as well as for the other States of the Union.

WASTE, WASTE, AND MORE WASTE

Mr. President, the American people are sick and tired of schemes to provide identification bracelets for teenagers to exchange; of stockpiled penicillin going to waste because of faulty planning; of millions of contradictory pamphlets; of high-salaried boondogglers; of screeching sirens; of highly publicized bomb-shelter honeymoons; of waste and inefficiency; and of silly, shortsighted planning. In short, Mr. President, the American people are becoming tired of the whole confused mess of civil defense, as it is now being operated in this country.

Again, I wish to pay tribute to the hundreds of thousands of patriotic Americans who volunteered their time and efforts often at great risk to themselves. These people performed valuable service, while they were directed by paid officials from behind their safe desks. Americans have responded before in times of disaster, and will do so again.

Mr. President, Americans will always respond to calls for help in times of flood, fire, or windstorm; and they do not need the doubtful leadership of the civil defense agency, as it now is operated.

Mr. President, only recently, the auditor of the State of Ohio—who happens to be a member of the Grand Old Party, of which I am not a member—has been conducting an audit of the $1½ million in surplus property donated to the civil defense agency in Ohio during the last few years. Twenty-two counties are involved. Six audits have been completed. The result is a sad commentary on the entire civil defense program. It typifies what I feel sure has been repeated in all of the States which have been receiving similar Government property.

In practically all of the six counties, a large percentage of the property could no longer be located. It included barber kits, garbage cans, outdoor lampshades, adding machines, shaving kits, and a thousand other gimcracks of absolutely no use in case of an emergency. In Ohio, the Federal Government contributed more razor sets and razor kits than were essential to Yul-Brynnerize the entire male population of my State; and most of that paraphernalia disappeared while it was in the hands of the local civil defense officials who had charge of it.

Much of what could be found was being used by local governments in their day to day operations.

Watches were found in jewelery stores. Generators, typewriters, adding machines, aluminum pitchers, and sundry other emergency items were found in the homes of the local civil defense directors, county commissioners, or other government employees. All this was shown by the auditor of the State of Ohio, Mr. James A. Rhodes. Hardly any of the property was found where it would do any good in case of a nuclear attack, unless the local civil defense director wanted to quickly add up his assets on a "borrowed" civil defense adding machine, type his last will and testament on a "borrowed" civil defense typewriter, and take his last drink from a "borrowed" civil defense pitcher.

Perhaps the whole mess on which I hope to elaborate upon further, at a later date—can be summed up by the following statement in the report on Lucas County, Ohio—and now I shall quote from the report by the auditor of the State of Ohio on the operations in Lucas County, in which is located the great city of Toledo:

> Opportunity to avail themselves of the various bargains in surplus property has served as an incentive to being in the civil defense setup, we are told.

In other words, Mr. President, according to the auditor of the State of Ohio, in his report, on Lucas County many persons and governmental units joined the civil defense setup, as it was being operated in that area, for the sole purpose of getting hold of those bargains, the equipment which was given by the Federal Government for the civil defense of that area.

LET THE MILITARY TAKE OVER

Mr. President, the civil defense we have today is a myth. The only sensible thing to do is abolish the entire present setup, let the military make plans for coping with an emergency, and get the Red Cross and similar agencies to broadcast first-aid instructions on the television and the radio. After all, the defense of the civilians of our country is a part of the defense of our country, and that is the work of the military. The military should take it over now, as the military certainly would in the event of a nuclear war.

We should initiate a vigorous and continuing campaign of education on self-protection in a nuclear war, and we should use all the mediums of communication at our command—the television, the radio, the newspapers, the magazines, and our schools.

Civil defense is a part of our total defense. As such, it should be under the direction of those who know most about defense—our Military Establishment, our armed services.

In his message of August 25, 1959, to the Congress, the President, himself, stated that, along with our military defense and retaliatory forces, civil defense is a vital part of the Nation's total defense. Why then, I ask, has the administration never once urged the unification of our civil and military defense programs? Why continue with a separate agency, politically inspired, to handle the vital problem of the wartime defense of our populace?

Mr. President, only by such a unification can our Nation have a truly integrated defense posture, instead of the 50 different plans we have today, all headed by one big boondoggling bureaucracy in Washington.

The best minds in the Nation are agreed that it is highly essential that our Military Establishment be truly unified. They realize that there must be true unification of the Armed Forces, for the defense of our country.

In Canada, our ally to the north, this has recently been commenced by taking the civil defense entirely away from the civilians, and placing it in the hands of the military.

In Britain, the civil defense functions, as we know them in this country, are being exercised by the Home Guard, by the military of Britain.

Certainly the best minds in our country realize, and all of our people should realize, that our Nation cannot afford the luxury of being saved separately and independently by the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marines, and the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, with the resulting huge waste of taxpayers' money.

Mr. President, of course all thoughtful Senators—and there are 100 of us in this body—believe in unification of the Armed Forces. We want to save the money of the taxpayers of the Nation. We have gone a short distance toward real unification of our Armed Forces; but we still have a great distance to go.

I am certain that in the ensuing months we will work hard to try to bring about a real unification of our Armed Forces, so there will be an end to the duplication of efforts by the various branches, and so there will be a saving of billions of dollars every year to the taxpayers of the Nation. As a result, our Armed Forces will better serve the Nation, better defend it, and be in a better position to have immediate retaliatory power against any enemy which might attack us.

Mr. President, the defense of the civilians of our country is a part of the defense of the Nation. Likewise, Mr. President, our Nation can ill afford to separate the defense of its most valuable resource—the people of the United States—from the defense of the Nation as a whole. The people of the United States must be protected.

Our entire Defense Establishment—military and civil—must be unified.

Mr. President, I am about to conclude. May I say that in the event of a missile attack, the military would undoubtedly take over. In the Civil War, or the War Between the States, President Abraham Lincoln almost immediately suspended the writ of habeas corpus and declared martial law. The Civil War, bitter as it was, would be as nothing compared to a nuclear attack upon this Nation suddenly by missiles from abroad. Immediately upon an attack, whether planned, or accidently as a result of some trigger-happy Soviet submarine commander, for instance, our retaliatory forces would be brought to bear. We outstrip the Soviet Union on the basis of at least 3 to 1 in the power of our manned jet bombers. They immediately would go into action. Immediately, the President of the United States would declare a grave national emergency. The military would take over.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], who is now presiding, and others who have served our country in the Armed Forces in time of war, know that at such a time as that civilians in arm bands would cut no figure whatsoever.

I have said this before, and I say it again. Can one imagine what a hard-boiled sergeant would say to a civilian with an arm band who tried to interfere with the movement of our Armed Forces at such a time?

So, Mr. President, the sensible thing to do is to face the facts and merge our civil defense program with the military.

Mr. President, rather than pour billions of dollars into a shaky, unsound, untried plan for passive defense, it seems to me that much more logical is the old but sound notion that the best defense is a tremendous offense. America's shelter lies in weapons. It lies in the trained men of our Armed Forces. If we can perfect our preparedness—and I know that we can—then, Mr. President, we shall never be hit first or at any time.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I move that the bill, H.R. 1, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if we may have order in the Senate, the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], at the request of the leadership, is prepared to make a brief statement concerning the very fine results obtained, I think, in the conference which the Senator headed and on which the minority leader and other distinguished Senators served. I think this announcement will be of great interest and real satisfaction to most Members of the Senate. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts can be recognized at this time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief informal report as to the results of our conference, with the understanding that tomorrow, after the language is put together and the staff work is concluded, we will be able to make a formal report to the Senate on the various differences between the House bill and the Senate bill.

I wish particularly to express my appreciation to the minority leader of the Senate [Mr. DIRKSEN], who, I believe, together with his colleagues the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], made it possible for us to reach an agreement, an agreement which I find satisfactory and which I wholeheartedly support.

To reach such a result on bills as difficult, on a subject as explosive, on a subject on which emotion runs so high as labor-management relations, and try to bring together bills as different as the bill which passed the Senate and that which passed the House was an extremely difficult task. As Senators know, it occupied the attention of the conferees for 2 weeks.

I speak respectfully of the bill which was passed in the other body, but it seems to me that there were serious shortcomings in the reform bill which passed the House, and the conferees on the Democratic side, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], shared my view that we could not under any circumstances have voted for the Landrum-Griffin bill. While many Members of the Senate hold an opposite view, if the Landrum-Griffin bill had come to the floor of the Senate in the form in which it passed the House, in my opinion all the Senators would have regretted it finally. Also, it would have been an extremely close vote, and the bill might not have passed if we had had a chance to debate it.

I say that because I believe that the House of Representatives was not wholly aware of the provisions in the Landrum-Griffin bill. It was not the bill reported by the House committee. It was offered as a substitute on the floor, and after 2 days of debate was passed.

When we view the significant provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill, one after another, in my opinion we must admit they go far beyond reform, and I will document that tomorrow. They go into an area which I think would limit what we all would consider legitimate activities of men and women who bargain collectively.

Changes which were made, and, speaking from the point of view of Senator McNAMARA and Senator RANDOLPH, our views have been uniform in this matter. The changes which we believe to be particularly desirable are first, that we protected the working standards, and this was also supported by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and others, in the garment and apparel industries, to make sure that the hard-won standards in those industries would be protected.

Secondly, the House bill prohibited the union from carrying on any kind of activity to disseminate informational material to secondary sites. They could not say that there was a strike in a primary plant.

We quite obviously are opposed to their affecting liberties in a secondary strike or affecting employees joining, but the House language prohibited not only secondary picketing, but even the handing out of handbills or even taking out an advertisement in a newspaper.

Under the language of the conference, we agreed there would not be picketing at a secondary site. What was permitted was the giving out of handbills or information through the radio, and so forth.

Thirdly, we provide protection for picketing which I believe to be essential, and whch can be discussed tomorrow. I believe that under the language on picketing in the House bill, it would be very difficult to organize workers who are unorganized.

We put a limit on no man's land.

It was the opinion of the Senate that the Federal law should prevail with respect to interstate commerce, and, in order to compromise that feature, it was agreed that the State law could prevail, but only in those areas in which the National Labor Relations Board does not now assume jurisdiction. I understand the Board assumes a good deal of jurisdiction today. I think the House language might have permitted the Board to yield and have permitted State laws to prevail over vast areas of interstate commerce. That cannot be done. We have closed no man's land.

We have protected the right of employees of a secondary employer, in the case of a primary strike, to refuse to cross a primary strike picket line. The House language was vague.

We have protected the right of the union to follow struck work, in the traditional way provided under the Taft-Hartley Act. That was in doubt under the language of the Landrum-Griffin bill.

We eliminated a section of the Landrum-Griffin bill which would have permitted damage suits against unions which might have picketed for organizational purposes. We have provided regular remedies. Damage suits were the most serious shortcoming of the Landrum-Griffin bill; and yet, as it referred to another section, I doubt if any Member of the House knew that such a provision was in the bill. The Senate conferees did not know it until yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

We have provided protection in respect to membership lists. For example, under the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill with respect to membership lists, anyone could have copied down membership lists. Union membership lists have historically been considered a relatively private affair.

We provided that mailings must be made by the union, and that any member who is a bona fide candidate may inspect the lists, but he may not copy them.

The Landrum-Griffin provision on employer reporting was hopelessly inadequate.

I do not say that everyone will like what we now have, but I will say, having been a member of the Labor Committees of the House or Senate for 13 years, that the bill in its present form is a vast improvement over the Landrum-Griffin bill, from the point of view of reform, and also from the point of view of protecting legitimate employer-union activities.

To accomplish that result required concessions on the part of all of us. The bill as it comes from conference is not a bill which I would have supported originally, but, being faced with the task of reconciling the House and Senate versions, and feeling that any bill brought to the floor of the Senate would have produced a chaotic result, I think we have arrived at a bill which, overall, I can wholeheartedly support.

We have achieved this result because of the work of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who does not agree with us. I understand why he is as disappointed as I am over some sections.

We are also greatly indebted to Members on the minority side.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to concur in the report which my distinguished friend from Massachusetts has made. I shall speak more to the point tomorrow, but I believe that the important thing my colleagues in the Senate should realize is that that which was absent in the Senate version of the labor reform bill is now in the bill which Senators will have an opportunity to vote up or down tomorrow.

I announced my reason for casting the sole vote against the Kennedy-Ervin bill as being based upon the fact that it did not contain certain provisions suggested by the McClellan committee; namely, a provision for action in the so-called no man's land area. The present version of the bill contains such a provision.

The original bill did not adequately deal with organizational picketing, which the conference version now takes care of.

The original bill did not effectively deal with secondary boycotts, which the bill in the form in which it comes from the conference now takes care of.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that this is a vastly superior bill. I believe that the bill in its present form is one for which my colleagues can vote. I think it is a bill which the American people deserve.

Naturally, I should like to see this body continue to seek legislation which will tend to curb, reduce, or equalize the almost unparalleled power which resides in the leadership of some of our unions; but that is a problem for the coming session.

I would be remiss in my duty to my conscience if I did not pay a compliment to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. His task has been long and very arduous and difficult. I probably know better than does any other Member of this body the terrific pressures to which he has been constantly subjected. His aim, all through the conference, has been one of arriving at a bill which would correct those things which need correcting, without doing damage to the labor movement. I am convinced that such a bill has emerged.

It has been a very unusual and thrilling experience to have served on this conference committee, dealing with a subject which is so technical, so delicate, and so vital to the people of this country, to have had the assistance of members of the opposite party from both sides of this great building, and to have had the assistance of the staff members, who added so greatly to the understanding of the conferees in this delicate field. It was an experience which I shall never forget.

I want the Senator from Massachusetts to know that, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I greatly appreciate his dedicated efforts toward obtaining a compromise which did not compromise away the rights of the people, and at the same time did not eat away at the rights and purposes of organized labor.

Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DIRKSEN, and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield first to the Senator from West Virginia, a member of the committee.

REASONABLE, NOT REPRESSIVE, COMPROMISE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I would not wish to indulge in a pleasantry. I feel, however, as we discuss this conference action rather briefly this evening, that I express sincere admiration for the qualities of compromise, courage, and leadership manifested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] the chairman of our conference.

I realized from the outset of the 12 days of study and counsel that we had a very exacting duty. My fellow conferees shared in this belief. I came to fully understand and genuinely appreciate the patience, the fairness, and the forthrightness with which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] conducted himself in this delicate, and sometimes not so deliberative, but always challenging assignment.

Mr. President, I sense that all the conferees, on both the Democratic and Republican sides of this Chamber, would desire to echo the sentiments which I express toward the astute Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KEN-NEDY]. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] already has voiced similar tribute.

We must not forget that there was a procedural matter which called for admirable leadership on the part of our majority leader, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He rightly advocated that legislation on the subject of labor-management reform be sent to conference. It is appropriate to praise the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] for having associated himself in this bipartisan effort to compose Senate and House versions. Senate and House conferees could compromise and counsel, and in numerous areas did diffuse differences.

It is a truism that there are as many sides to every question as there are parties or interests involved. And the great genius of the democratic process on Capitol Hill is that it offers a wider variety of solutions than can be encompassed by mere opposites. The final drafting of this type of legislation is embraced in the art of the possible—the art of compromise and conciliation.

Your conferees of the Senate were charged with the responsibility for a reasonable solution, one which would be corrective of abuses in this field of labor and management practices. Our solution is not a perfect result, but as one of the managers on behalf of this body, I toiled to prepare a report which would be restrictive where necessary but would not be repressive to the legions of loyal labor so vital to the strength of our country.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. I am pleased that the conference committee was able to reach a complete compromise agreement on labor-management reform legislation.

We worked extremely hard to reach this agreement. Our goal was to adopt legislation—a goal apparently shared by both Houses of Congress, the labor movement, business, and the American people as a whole. The labor movement, business, and the American people as a whole seemed to indicate that they wanted this legislation.

In reaching this goal, the Senate conferees at times retreated much further than I personally believed we should. Some provisions of the bill are still unnecessarily harsh.

Nevertheless, I feel the final product has been tremendously improved in this regard from the restrictive measure passed by the House.

The House bill has received a big injection of fairness which it did not have originally, and it was with this achievement that I was able to sign the conference report.

I would certainly feel that I was neglecting my obligation to the chairman of the conference committee, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] if I did not add my few words to what has already been said about his fine work in the conference. He displayed great intelligence and patience at all times, and gave everyone an opportunity to be heard on all sides of all questions. I think he should be complimented by the Senate for the fine job he did in bringing forth this legislation. I am sure that what has developed as a result of the conference will be in the interest of the country as a whole.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senate was importuned by many telegrams and many letters to forego the measure which it had passed after careful deliberation by a vote of 90 to 1 and to adopt the House measure. The junior Senator from Massachusetts recommended that the Senate accede to the request of the House for a conference to compose differences between the two bills. Had I been forced to choose between the Senate bill and the House bill, I would have chosen the the Senate bill, because it was more precisely drawn. It provided stronger safeguards against corruption and racketeering than did the House bill. But the House bill was not without its merits.

The fact that the Senate, despite all the pressure to the contrary, sent its bill to a conference with the House; the fact that we have now before us an historic measure representing an improvement upon the House bill, is a manifestation of the wisdom of following the time-honored and tried parliamentary procedure.

The committee of conference has brought to us an agreement with which I do not agree in all respects. But I think the conference committee has labored long, well, fruitfully, and honorably. I wish to pay tribute to each member of the conference, and particularly to the chairman of the conference. The junior Senator from Massachusetts has been courteous and patient, not only with his fellow confrees, but with other Senators who were concerned. Often he has taken the time to explain to me and to other Senators the points of difference and the points of difficulty. I have placed faith in his leadership, as have many other Senators.

Now we are approaching the enactment of an historic measure. It represents a landmark of accomplishment in public service by the junior Senator from Massachusetts. I congratulate him and salute him upon bringing to the Senate an agreement and a bill upon a controversial and vexatious subject. It may not be perfect. As he has said, it is not entirely to his liking, as it is not to mine. But it will represent substantive legislation in a troublesome field constituting a severe national problem. If the bill goes too far in some respects, Congress will be here to correct it.

I congratulate and salute the junior Senator from Massachusetts and all the conferees.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in closing, I wish to say that in criticizing the Landrum-Griffin bill, I do not in any way criticize Representative LANDRUM or Representative GRIFFIN. They made great efforts to have the conference succeed. Similarly, I pay tribute to Representative BARDEN, Representative THOMPSON, Representative PERKINS, Representative AYERS, and Representative KEARNS. All of them played a significant part in the success of the conference.

Also, Mr. President, I wish to compliment the distinguished majority leader of the Senate, whose judgment that this matter should be referred to a conference rather than be disposed of on the floor of the Senate, has been vindicated.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues who served on the conference committee in paying tribute to the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for the fair and cooperative manner in which he conducted the meetings.

We have had many long and arduous meetings and obviously compromise was necessary on the part of all concerned in order that worthwhile results could be achieved in a very complex legislative field.

I regret that more was not done to ameliorate the problems of employees in the construction industry. Because of the peculiar nature of this industry rights enjoyed by other segments of organized labor have not been available to workers in the building trades and to me this represents a definite inequity.

For this reason I proposed an amendment which has been recommended by President Eisenhower since 1954, has the full support of the Secretary of Labor and was included in the administration's labor reform bill.

I believe this amendment might have been approved by a majority of the conferees had it not been for the fact that we were informed this morning that a point of order would be raised against it in the House and that the point of order would be sustained.

In my opinion the bill approved by the conferees will do more to bring about reform in the labor movement without upsetting the balance of labor management relations at the bargaining table than either the Landrum-Griffin bill, which passed the House, or the Kennedy-Ervin bill, which passed the Senate.

All in all, the conference was both a trying and an enlightening experience. I feel that it has produced results which will work to the general good.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I should have made this unanimous-consent request when I had the floor earlier. I apologize for taking the time of the Senate to do so now.

I believe most Senators have had placed on their desks the May 1959 research report of the Public Opinion Index for Industry, published by the Opinion Research Corp. The report is entitled "The Labor Law the People Want—If the Voters Were Writing the New Labor Law, Here Is What It Would Provide."

If Senators will peruse this report—and I shall place it in the RECORD—they will find that the conferees were justified in bringing to the Senate the Landrum-Griffin bill with the improvements which have been made to it, because the bill is in very close keeping with what the research shows the American people demand in a labor law.

The report contains some charts which will have to be interpolated. I ask unanimous consent that that interpolation be done, knowing full well the rule against the printing of charts. I ask unanimous consent that the material I refer to be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Research Report of the Public Opinion Index for Industry, May 1959]

THE LABOR LAW THE PEOPLE WANT—IF THE VOTERS WERE WRITING THE NEW LABOR LAW, HERE IS WHAT IT WOULD PROVIDE

There is wide difference of opinion on the kind of labor legislation needed, and also on where the public stands.

Industrial leadership generally has stressed the need for new laws.

Both the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers have pushed for a stronger bill of rights section and further Taft-Hartley curbs.

Top labor leaders have denounced the reform bill passed by the Senate as antilabor.

National Maritime Union's Curran described the legislation as "a buckshot law * * * designed to get unions."

John L. Lewis cited "all of these bills as an attempt made by interests adverse to the formation of labor unions and collective bargaining, people with axes to grind, people with motives sinister or otherwise."

AFL–CIO President Meany announced the federation will fight the Senate bill "in its present form" on the ground that it would "jeopardize the liberty of all trade unions."

To find out where the people stand, the index has taken a nationwide probability sampling of opinion, going into the field immediately after the Senate passed the Kennedy-Ervin bill. The public was questioned on the provisions contained in the bill, plus other relevant issues.

1. The public is generally aware that current labor legislation is designed to tighten up on union activities—and it favors this.

Note below that union member families vote as strongly in favor of tighter regulation over unions as does the public.

"What is your personal feeling—should the labor laws regulate unions more closely than they have in the past, or not as closely?"

General public	65
Union member families	67
Not as closely:
General public	6
Union member families	9

This is not to say that the public has been watching the day-by-day activities in Congress on the labor bill. Only 27 percent say they have heard or read about Congress working on the new labor law. Union member families are little more aware—32 percent.

But awareness that a problem exists has been on the increase.

In the January 1959, index report, 73 percent of the public had heard or read about corruption on racketeering in labor unions as compared to 49 percent 2 years earlier.

2. Both the public and union member families would hit at graft and corruption in labor unions by placing stricter restraints on union officials.

In all, 19 possible provisions of the labor law were covered in the survey. Each person was asked, "If you were in Congress, would you be for or against laws to do the following things."

These provisions hit directly at the corruption practices that have come to public attention through the McClellan hearings.

There is also a strong balance of opinion in favor of limiting trusteeship by which one union can maintain control over another. This, however, tends to be a rather unfamiliar issue for many people. Note the sizable no opinion vote.

4. Provisions that deal with organizational picketing, the secondary boycott, "Hot Cargo" contracts, are regarded as somewhat technical—but still have the weight of the public and union member favor.

No opinion on five such issues ranges from 25 to 38 percent, higher than on the less complex questions.

Note that union member families as well as the public are consistently in favor of tightening the rules on union picketing and organizational practices. Only in the 9-month picketing prohibition is the balance of opinion almost evenly split.

5. Certain restrictions on employers in their dealings with union officials also receive strong approval.

At the same time that the public would force disclosure upon union officials, they want assurances that employers too will deal in the open on union matters.

COMPANY GIFTS TO UNION OFFICIALS

"A law requiring employers to report any loans or gifts to union officials."

The public is also in favor of extending jurisdiction to State agencies for small business firms involved in labor disputes.

Note that "no opinion" is at the one third level. This, again, indicates a relatively low level of familiarity with the issues at stake in this question.

IN SUM

In the past 15 years the Public Opinion Index has been periodically surveying the public's attitude on labor issues. Through these years the evidence shows that the public is overwhelmingly in favor of the idea of collective bargaining. It is also evident, however, that there has been a continuing fear of union power. The vote for close Government regulation of unions has averaged 60 percent over 10 surveys since 1949. The Taft-Hartley law was a legislative articulation of this basic public fear of union power.

In the last 2 years, the revelations of the McClellan committee have shocked the American people. In the latest sampling some 73 percent reported they had heard or read about corruption and racketeering in labor unions. This survey shows strong public sentiment for legislative reforms to eliminate financial corruption in union affairs, to insure more democracy and less bossism within the union structure, and to revise the rules on union organization and picketing.

The people do not desire legislation that will undermine the collective bargaining function of unions, but they do want a new set of guiding principles.

One other remarkable fact is that people are feeling the effects of inflation and have come to the conclusion that wages and prices cannot be disassociated. The series of wage-price spirals since World War II have gotten across the fact that whenever wages have gone up in basic industries, prices have inevitably followed.

Following pages show additional evidence of this in the public's attitude toward the current steel negotiations:

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, at the outset, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the members of the staff of the Senate Labor Committee be permitted privileges of the floor today and tomorrow, when the conference report is under deliberation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to state that such a request has already been made, and agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well.

Mr. President, the conference committee as an institution has been referred to by students of political science and government as the third house. I have seen such references many times. Such a reference is included in a book which was written in connection with the Reorganization Act of 1946; and it was pointed out that the third house has amazing powers in impressing its will upon proposed legislation which has already been under consideration by both the House and the Senate; and it has vast authority even under restrictive rules, such as those which obtain in the House, in fashioning legislation, in refining expressions and terms, and in imparting meaning to them, so that the third house becomes a powerful instrumentality in our whole legislative setup.

Mr. President, that would be particularly true in connection with so abstruse a bill, which has so many complexities; and I would be less than candid if I did not confess my own inadequacy in attempting to keep up with all the complications and ramifications of this bill, which first was passed by the Senate, and for which the House now has adopted an amendment in the form of a complete substitute.

The bill got to the conference committee—the third house—because I think prudence and discretion and wise counsel prevailed on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I am not insensible to the spirit and the feeling in the waning weeks of the Congress, when we wish to drive to a goal, and leave here. I know the appeal implicit in the strong urge to leave the Capitol and go to the halcyon beaches, the mountains, and the other vacation areas, when the hot winds of summer caress this town. So I can well understand the urge to leave here.

So, Mr. President, I could detect—as others could—that there was a desire among Senators to strike right at the heart of the matter, by voting on the House amendment as it came to the Senate.

I pay the majority leader a well deserved compliment for insisting—and I insisted, with him—that a better job could be done if the bill were sent to conference. After all, that procedure follows a philosophical principle which Confucius had in mind long ago when he referred to "sweet reasonableness." In fact, Mr. President, the majority leader has often referred to "reasonable men around the conference table."

Was it not Isaiah who said, "Come now, and let us reason together"?

So 14 of us sat down and reasoned together, in rather amicable and friendly spirit.

There were occasions when ire arose and words were bandied about the table. But, like true gentlemen, we saw to it that they quickly subsided; and the conference committee went to its labors.

So I am delighted, because in my considered judgment the conference report is better than the bill as passed by the Senate, and is better than the bill as passed by the House, and is the product of the best the conferees could bring back.

I pay my tribute to the distinguished chairman of the conference committee [Mr. KENNEDY]. It is no easy task at the shank of the session to be on the receiving end of the slings and arrows of fortune—whether outrageous or not. I think he showed rare patience and forbearance.

I also wish to pay a high compliment to my minority colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who in every section of the country is regarded as something of a specialist in this field.

I pay an equal compliment to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], who has done yeoman service, and who, by means of the motions he offered, showed, I think, rare judgment and a keen knowledge and concept of the subject before us.

If I have to say anything about myself, I must say that I am afraid my principal duty in the conference was to try, when it seemed that frictions might explode into flame, to make judicious use of an oilcan whenever I could. I find that, on occasion, that serves a useful purpose, too.

Mr. President, I compliment my colleagues of the conference on both sides, and particularly the chairman, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. He has a rare knowledge of the bill. His knowledge of it has confounded me on occasions. It has intrigued me. I salute him for the studious propensities which were implied in his mastery of a bill in so highly complicated a field.

So, Mr. President, we have brought to the Senate the best product we can on this occasion.

At this time I wish to say a word about the allusion which was made by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Vermont, in regard to a point of order, because I am afraid I had something to do with it. It was not partisan in any sense whatever. But inasmuch as I had served a long time in the House of Representatives, and had served for 16 years on conference committees, and had developed some familiarity with the rules of the House of Representatives, it occurred to me, yesterday afternoon, that language dealing with so-called situs agreements involving the construction industry and the legality or illegality of a strike which involved many contractors—including prime contractors and subcontractors—was new matter. It did not appear in the Senate version of the bill; it did not appear in the House version of the bill; and although it was germane to a House provision under the general subject of boycotts and picketing, yet is was a new substantive provision.

So while there was a hiatus in the conference, on yesterday afternoon, I said to the distinguished Representative from Georgia, PHIL LANDRUM, that I would like to go to the House and talk to the Parliamentarian. So, together with Representative LANDRUM, I went to the House, and talked to the Parliamentarian. Inasmuch as I have known Lewis Deschler intimately for a long time, I said to him, "Lew, here is the picture. I think you know the whole situation. Can you give us some suggestions as to what your notions are in regard to whether this is in order in the conference report?"

He replied, "I will give you an opinion off the top of my head; I don't want to be committed at the moment. But I would say, offhand, that, generally speaking, under the House rules, new matter is not within the frame of the conference, and therefore it would be out of order."

I initiated that, if no one knew it before; and it was said to me in the presence of Representative LANDRUM, one of the authors of the House version of the bill.

So, Mr. President, at the proper time, in the conference, that point was made. I helped energize it up to a proper degree; and we let it go at that.

Then we came up with this problem: If we were to agree on everything except one item, would it be taken back to the Senate, for instructions; and would it go back to the House; and then would the point of order be raised, and be found good—with the result that, after all our labors, we would find that we still did not have a bill on which we could take final action?

Mr. President, I do not subscribe to the principle which is the basis of the old ditty, "The King of France with 20,000 men went up the hill, and then came down again." I did not like the idea of proceeding in that way. So I thought it would be splendid to settle that point in advance.

Therefore, this morning I concurred in the sentiment expressed by Representative BARDEN, the cochairman of the conference, when he said he felt it was his duty to make the point of order, under the House rules. Had I sat where he sat, I would have said that I felt it my duty to do so, since the matter in question was new matter.

As a result, we arrived at compromise language which was finally adopted.

Mr. President, I believe the chairman of the conference will agree with me when I say that if we have not completed the necessary action, in the sense that something still remains to be done in connection with the construction field, certainly the majority leader has given his word, and the chairman of the conference committee has given his word, and the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] concurs, and I concur, that when we come back here in January, if there is something to be done in that field, we will do it, so that nobody will feel aggrieved or feel that he has been forgotten in the process.

Our business for the moment is to get as effective a conference report as we can. The very fact that 13 of the 14 conferees have fully concurred and that 12, I think the number is, have signed the conference report—is that the correct number, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Twelve out of fourteen is a pretty good score for any conference dealing with a bill of this character.

So I wanted to make plain that this question of the point of order was actually initiated by a Republican and a Democrat. I happen to be the Republican. PHIL LANDRUM was the Democrat. We went to the House side to get an informal opinion, which was better formalized this morning, after there was an opportunity to consider it further.

So I think the practical thing to do was exactly what the conference committee did under those circumstances. I am very happy indeed we got a conference report.

I wish to say one thing more by way of conclusion. There have been made in the country at times allegations that contributions are made to senatorial campaigns and to the campaigns of Representatives, and that therefore Senators and Representatives are being carried around in somebody's pocket when we come to grips with a bill that involves management and labor and the public.

Mr. President, I think this conference report is a living exemplification of the fact that when the chips are down, the Senators and Representatives are in nobody's pocket, and that they have impressed their will in what I think is the general interest and the well-being of all of the people of the country.

We were sensible of the interests of labor. We were mindful of the interests of management. But we were almost supersensitive about the interests of all of the people of the United States; and that is what counts. I think the Senate and the House, and the Members of both parties, can be proud of the work of the conference, because it rebuts these rather careless and unrestrained allegations that sometimes we are carried around in somebody's pocket. I am proud of the work, and I am distinctly proud of the legislative body of which I have the honor to be a Member.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I merely wish to commend the distinguished minority leader for the very fine statement he has made. I know perhaps more than any other Member of the Senate the burdens he carries. I know there has not been a day when it has not been necessary to have at least 3 or 4 conversations with him in connection with arranging the schedule of the conferees to fit in with the duties we have here in the Senate.

I am very proud of my young friend from Massachusetts, who demonstrated that he could say to his colleagues, in the words of the prophet Isaiah, "Come now, and let us reason together." I am likewise proud of each majority member of the conference who participated in bringing about the results which have been obtained.

I have counseled a number of times with my friend Senator GOLDWATER, ranking minority member of the conference, and with Senator DIRKSEN, another member of the conference. Although I have not had a chance to discuss this matter with the House conferees, I think each Member on both sides of the aisle should be commended for his lack of partisanship.

The conferees have done what they consider to be best for America, and in doing what is best for America one always does what is best for his own party.

I have not detected any deep partisan division in these conferences. The prophets of gloom and doom are in for a surprise when they see the results of a conference committee that is presided over by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and upon which there served the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

These Senators sat down with such distinguished members of the House as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANDRUM], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN]. The conference committee threshed out the differences between the two bills in a spirit of give-and-take which ended—as it always does—in improving the legislation.

When men from different environments, with different political philosophies, with varying political views, can sit in a room and finally—at least 13 out of the 14—return with a joint recommendation, it is a great tribute to our democratic system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate recesses this evening it convene at 9:30 o'clock tomorrow morning, so we may have a morning hour.

I announce we will not have any votes before 11 o'clock a.m., but Senators desire to make brief statements. I would like to have that order entered, if I may.

INJURY OF CLARK MOLLENHOFF

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I intended to mention this prior to this time. At a moment when we should feel jubilation, we have occasion to feel some sadness.

One of the most valued contributors to the solution of this whole problem of graft and corruption in the labor movement has been Mr. Clark Mollenhoff, of the Des Moines newspapers. Mr. Mollenhoff, along with men like Westbrook Pegler and others, has been a pioneer in pointing out graft and corruption in the labor movement.

I am sorry to announce that Mr. Mollenhoff has suffered a broken neck. He is in the veterans' hospital at Des Moines, Iowa. I know he would appreciate hearing from Senators, who must have a high regard for his ability.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator for that observation. Earlier today, less than an hour ago, I wrote Mr. Mollenhoff a note. I appreciate the Senator from Arizona's reminding other Senators.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I wish to pay tribute to the staff of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, headed by Bob Kennedy, and to the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. It has been his diligent work, his persistent efforts, which brought about the revelations that enabled the Senate to take this important action last year, and again this year.

Senator McCLELLAN and his dedicated staff have pointed the way to effective steps to protect the American people from the hoodlums and racketeers who have victimized honorable labor. He was the pioneer in this field.

I do not think any Member of either body is deserving of more credit for the results we are about to see produced than is Senator McCLELLAN.

I am grateful to Speaker of the House, Mr. RAYBURN, and to the Democratic and Republican leaders of the House, Mr. McCORMACK and Mr. HALLECK, and to the members of the House Labor Committee for their contributions in this field.

I hope the conference report can be acted upon tomorrow.

I know the morning business and other speeches will keep us busy until at least 10:30 or 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. I should not expect any votes before noon tomorrow. We do want to stay in session late tomorrow evening, midnight, if necessary, to try to get action on the conference report, because it will have to go to the other body after it is acted on here.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am much pleased that the Senator from Texas showed his thoughtfulness in commending the Senator from Arkansas for the work which that Senator has done. I think the ultimate results which are reflected in the bill which will come before the Senate tomorrow constitute a triumph for Senator McCLELLAN in the fight he made to bring about a correction of abuses in labor-management relations.

For a moment, figuratively, he was seated off the stage behind the curtains. I am glad the Senator from Texas brought him out onto the stage. It would have been tragic tonight if he had gone unnoticed and unmentioned by the Senate.

I say to my colleague, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], the ultimate content of the bill, in my opinion, in a substantial degree is the product of the Senator's work. I commend the Senator for it. The amendments which the Senator offered on the floor of the Senate, which were rejected, have ultimately become a part of the bill. My commendations go to the Senator from Arkansas, and my commendations go to the entire membership of the committee for the excellent work done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas that when the Senate recesses tonight it recess until 9:30 tomorrow morning? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to compliment the majority leader for his statement about the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Ohio concerning the Senator from Arkansas. I do not know of any man in the Congress, or throughout the United States, who has worked more zealously or who has accomplished more in the field of labor relations and in the cleaning up of corruption and helping to expose abuse than the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May we have order in the Chamber, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina will suspend. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from South Carolina may proceed.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am indeed pleased that the majority leader has recognized the Senator's contribution, and I was very glad to hear the words of tribute paid by the able Senator from Ohio.

I feel, Mr. President, we are fortunate to have a man of such high character, high principles, great intellect, and tremendous courage in the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas is a great asset to the people of this Nation. I am proud to be a Member of the body of which he is a Member.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I sincerely thank the distinguished majority leader and my colleagues for their complimentary references to me personally and to the Senate select committee of which it has been my privilege and honor to be the chairman during the past 2½ years.

Mr. President, I wish to say that whatever success the committee has had, whatever we have achieved, and whatever contribution we may have made to the public welfare have been due to two things.

First, the committee has been working as a team. It has not been a one-man project.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order in the rear of the Chamber, please, so that the Senator can be heard?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will suspend. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Arkansas may proceed.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, it has not been a one-man project. There has been, on the part of the membership of the committee, a dedicated service and a definite objective to get the truth, and to bring to this body the facts and accurate information upon which it could intelligently legislate to correct some evil conditions that have developed and that now exist in the field of labor-management relations. That is the first point, Mr. President.

Secondly, and of no less importance, is the fact that we were able to assemble, I think, one of the most able staffs of young men and young women, to assist us in this work, that has ever been assembled, possibly, to assist any investigating committee of this body. To them, under the leadership of Mr. Robert Kennedy as chief counsel, goes great credit for their dedication, for their long hours of work, and for their fearlessness and their courage. It takes courage to "beard" some of these "characters" in their "den," to look them in the face and interrogate them with respect to some of their activities and conduct, which we have exposed, and which have reflected the conditions that moved the Congress to take the action it has.

So, whatever may be said about the chairman must be said for all members of the committee. Whatever is said, Mr. President, for the members of the committee must also be said for the excellent staff, each one of whom, to the full limit of his or her individual capacity, has made a worthwhile contribution to the result we have before us this evening. I sincerely hope and I honestly believe that organized labor, management, and the public at large have been served, and will be served, by our labors and the laws that the Congress shall enact as a result thereof.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] to refer H.R. 1 to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am informed by the author of the motion that Senators are ready for the call of the roll. If the yeas and nays have been ordered, we can get a vote on that now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, at a time when the eyes of the whole world are upon us in our foreign relations; when the President of the United States is flying from one world capital to another in his fight for the preservation of peace and security; when we are in Berlin and elsewhere relying upon the scrupulous maintenance of our treaty obligations and those of others; we cannot ourselves ignore these obligations in any area—especially where the interests involved are those of Canada, one of our closest allies. But this is the issue involved in H.R. 1, now before the Senate.

The motion to rerefer this bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations again brings before the Senate a matter on which we voted on March 18, 1959, at which time this bill was referred to the Committee on Public Works with the clear understanding that it was within the power of the Senate, should it so decide, that the bill could be sent to the Foreign Relations Committee subsequently.

We should not take such action without considering the effect on our foreign relations, not merely with Canada, but with every other nation with whom we have obligations based upon treaty or past common interest and which would be watching carefully how we honor these obligations. In the field of water rights alone, we have a number of other agreements, such as those with Mexico regarding the Rio Grande and Rio Colorado, with Canada as to a number of the border lakes, the Columbia and St. Lawrence Rivers and Niagara Falls, and with the Republic of Panama involving the water required for the Panama Canal. We also have many other areas of joint interest with Canada at this very moment in which negotiations are under way and which will be affected by the approach we take in this matter. These include areas of international trade, finance and defense policy, and such specific matters as tolls on the Welland Canal, Columbia River development and St. Lawrence Seaway power.

The aspect of this legislation involving the interest of Canada is the one to which the least study has been devoted in past committee consideration, and the note of the Canadian Government of February 20, 1959, clearly puts this issue before us. In a reply to a State Department request for its views, the Government of Canada indicated that—

> Any authorization for an additional diversion would be incompatible with the arrangements for the St. Lawrence Seaway and power development, and with the Niagara Treaty of 1950, and would be prejudicial to navigation and power development which these mutual arrangements were designed to improve and facilitate.
> The point has been made repeatedly by Canada that every withdrawal of water from the basin means less depth available for shipping in harbors and in channels. Additional withdrawals would have adverse effects on the hydroelectric generation potential on both sides of the border at Niagara Falls and in the international section of the St. Lawrence River, as well as in the Province of Quebec, and would inflict hardship on communities and industries on both sides of the border.
> The Government of Canada, therefore, protests against the implementation of proposals contained in H.R. 1.

Even stronger notes were sent by Canada on April 9, 1959, and just last week, on August 21, 1959. The April note stated:

> Every diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreased the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes. The Government of Canada is opposed to any action which will have the effect of reducing the volume of water in the Great Lakes Basin. Careful inquiry has failed to reveal any sources of water in Canada which could be added to the present supplies of the basin to compensate for further withdrawals in the United States of America. The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States of America and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago. * * *
> Because of the importance attached by the United States of America and Canada to the honoring of international undertakings in letter and in spirit, the Government of Canada views with serious concern any possible impairment of agreements and undertakings relating to the Great Lakes Basin. Furthermore, the alarms created by repeated proposals for diversion which inevitably disturb the people and industry of Canada are a source of profound irritation to the relations between our two countries which we can ill afford.
> I am instructed therefore to express the hope of the Government of Canada that the United States of America will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes Basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

The latest note, delivered only last week, indicated that Canada had taken note of the pending legislative developments and stated:

> In the view of my Government any additional diversion of water out of the Great Lakes watershed would be inconsistent with existing agreements and arrangements which together constitute an agreed regime with respect to these waters. The proposed unilateral derogation from the existing regime therefore occasions serious concern in Canada.

The question which we now have before us is whether this legislation is to be rereferred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where these problems can receive direct consideration in the light of our foreign policy problems with Canada and other countries. I believe that a referral to the Foreign Relations Committee will serve the best interests of the Senate and of the entire Nation.

A look at the specific jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Relations in rule XXV shows that it is charged with consideration of matters dealing with "relations of the United States with foreign nations generally," with "treaties," and with the "establishment of boundary lines between the United States and foreign nations." What could be a better description of the issues involved in this bill?

No matter what the interpretations of the various treaties by the many renowned international lawyers who have been quoted here may be, the action we are discussing certainly involved the prime jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee—our relations with other nations, within or outside treaty provisions.

Let us be clear about one thing. This is not an ordinary situation involving navigation, water power, pollution control or rivers and harbors. We cannot treat it as if it were. It is a matter which can throw a serious monkey wrench into our relations, at least with a nation like Canada whose friendship is signified by an open border thousands of miles long.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution of the 10th conference of the Inter-American Bar Association; and an extract from the address by Mr. John G. Laylin, Esq., of Washington, D.C., on the "Principles of International River Law" before the Inter-American Bar Association at Buenos Aires, November 1957.

There being no objection, the resolution and extract were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TENTH CONFERENCE OF THE INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, BUENOS AIRES, NOVEMBER 19, 1957—RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY UNANIMOUS VOTE BY THE FIRST COMMITTEE OF THE TENTH CONFERENCE, AND APPROVED WITHOUT DISSENT BY THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL AND THE PLENARY SESSION OF THE INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

The 10th conference of the Inter-American Bar Association resolves:

I. That the following general principles, which form part of existing international law, are applicable to every water-course or system of rivers or lakes (nonmaritime waters) which may traverse or divide the territory of two or more States; such a system will be referred to hereinafter as a "system of international waters":

1. Every State having under its jurisdiction a part of a system of international waters, has the right to make use of the waters thereof insofar as such use does not affect adversely the equal right of States having under their jurisdicton other parts of the system.

2. States having under their jurisdiction a part of a system of international waters are under a duty, in the application of the principle of equality of rights, to recognize the right of the other States having jurisdiction over a part of the system to share the benefits of the system, taking as the basis the right of each State to the maintenance of the status of its existing beneficial uses and to enjoy, according to the relative needs of the respective States, the benefits of future developments. In cases where agreement cannot be reached the States should submit their differences to an international court or an arbitral commission.

3. States having under their jurisdiction part of a system of international waters are under a duty to refrain from making changes in the existing regime that might affect adversely the advantageous use by one or more other States having a part of the system under their jurisdiction except in accordance with: (i) an agreement with the State or States affected or (ii) a decision of an international court or arbitral commission.

4. The foregoing principles do not alter the norm of international law that if the territory over which flow the waters of an international system is of such a nature as to provide a particular benefit, that benefit may be enjoyed exclusively by the State having jurisdiction over that territory, it being understood that such enjoyment will be in conformity with principle 3.

II. That a permanent committee of the Inter-American Bar Association be established to examine further the general juridical principles in this field, which commission should correspond with other international associations and organizations (U.N., OAS, etc.) devoting their attention to the study of the principles of law governing the uses of international rivers.

III. That this permanent committee study and prepare for the 11th conference of the Inter-American Bar Association a report dealing, among other matters that it considers of interest, with the following:

1. The question of the rights, if any, of nonriparian States which may have interests dependent upon a system of international waters.

2. The question of indemnification and of preventing unlawful acts in the use of waters of international systems that might cause irreparable damage or might even lead to a situation likely to endanger the peace or constitute a threat to the peace.

3. The question of sharing costs in the operation, maintenance, and development of a system of international waters.

4. The questions of pollution and flood control.

5. The question of the priorities as between different uses of the waters of a system of international waters and the relation of these priorities to the specific characteristics of the system.

6. The question of the differences in legal treatment of the right of dominion over as distinguished from the right to the use of a system of international waters.

7. The possibility of systematizing the practical rules put into effect by the States to achieve the most advantageous use of systems of interstate or international waters.

8. The difference, if any, arising in the application of general principles of international law as between international boundary water systems and successive water systems.

9. The possibility of creating general and/or regional commissions and tribunals in order to facilitate the most advantageous use of the waters and the solution of conflicts relating to the regime of systems of international waters.

IV. That the committee be requested to collect, classify, and analyze the precedents from every part of the world evidencing practices accepted as law governing the use of international waters.

V. That States with an interest in an international water system ought to participate, as soon as possible, in the collection and exchange of physical and economic data essential for the planning and realization of the rational use of the waters.

EXTRACT FROM ADDRESS BY JOHN G. LAYLIN, ESQ., OF WASHINGTON, D.C., BEFORE THE INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION AT BUENOS AIRES, NOVEMBER 1957

Professor Sauser-Hall considers the use in international matters, by analogy, of decisions of tribunals in Federal States. (L'Utilisation Industrielle des Fleuves Internationaux, 83 Recueil des Cours 471 [Hague Academy, 1953, II]). He says:

"The conflicts of interest which the utilization of water courses can stir up between the member States of a confederation of States, or of a Federal State present the strongest analogy to those which occur on the international plane between sovereign States; * * *" (Id. at 471–472, trans. ours. See Id. at 516–517.)

Further, under article 38 of the Statute of the I.C.J., there is no reason to deny the opinions of municipal judges at least the status of "teachings" of qualified publicists.

In a long and unbroken line of decisions the Supreme Court condemns the principle of absolute sovereign rights and upholds the principle of equitable apportionment. The contention that a State is entitled to do as it wishes with the waters of a interstate river physically within its boundaries was asserted by Colorado in two of the earlier cases on this subject, Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U.S. 125 (1902), 206 U.S. 46 (1907), and Wyoming v. Colorado, 259 U.S. 419 (1922), and was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court. In the latter case the Court said (Id. at 466):

"The contention of Colorado that she as a State rightfully may divert and use, as she may choose, the waters flowing within her boundaries in this interstate stream, regardless of any prejudice that this may work to others having rights in the stream below her boundary, can not be maintained. The river throughout its course in both States is but a single stream wherein each State has an interest which should be respected by the other. A like contention was set up by Colorado in her answer in Kansas v. Colorado and was adjudged untenable. Further consideration satisfies us that the ruling was right. It has support in other cases, of which Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Miller & Lux, 218 U.S. 258; Bean v. Morris, 221 U.S. 485; Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U.S. 208, and 200 U.S. 496; and Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, are examples."

The Supreme Court has consistently adhered to this position, whether the domestic law of the States concerned was the common law of riparian rights, the law of appropriation, or some variant of these. Among the principal cases are Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U.S. 208 (1901), 200 U.S. 496 (1906); North Dakota v. Minnesota, 263 U.S. 365 (1923); Wisconsin v. Illinois, 278 U.S. 367 (1929); Connecticut v. Massachusetts, 282 U.S. 660 (1931); New Jersey v. New York, 283 U.S. 336 (1931); Colorado v. Kansas, 320 U.S. 383 (1943); and Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U.S. 589 (1945).

The doctrine of absolute rights was also rejected by the Swiss Federal Tribunal in Aargau v. Zurich (Smith, at 39, 104), and by the German Staatsgerichtschof in Wuerttemberg and Prussia v. Baden (Id. at 55, 117). The Italian Court of Cassation, in Société Energie Electrique du Littoral Mediterranéen v. Compagnia Imprese Elettriche Liguri (1939), Annual Digest of Public International Law Cases [Lauterpacht] 1938–1940 (No. 47), said:

"International law recognizes the right on the part of every riparian State to enjoy as a participant of a kind of partnership created by the river, all the advantages deriving from it for the purpose of securing the welfare and the economic and civil progress of the nation. * * * However, although a State, in the exercise of its right of sovereignty, may subject public rivers to whatever regime it deems best, it cannot disregard the international duty, derived from that principle, not to impede or to destroy, as a result of this regime, the opportunity of the other States to avail themselves of the flow of water for their own national needs."

APPENDIX A

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENTAL THEORIES AND PRACTICES OF THE UNITED STATES, CHILE, AUSTRIA, AND INDIA

UNITED STATES

U.S. Attorney General Harmon in 1895 rendered an opinion, apropos a dispute with Mexico about the waters of the Rio Grande, that "the rules, principles, and precedents of international law impose no liability or obligation upon the United States" (21 Opinions of the Attorney General 267 (1895)). This opinion was rendered some years before the first decision of the U.S. Supreme Court on the subject; the Supreme Court has utterly disowned such a theory.

For half a century this country continued, in diplomatic negotiations both with Mexico and with Great Britain (for Canada), to assert from time to time a right to do as it wished with the waters within its territory. But its treaties with these two nations, (Smith, at 168, 170) made in 1906 and 1909 respectively, while formally reserving a right to assert this doctrine, incorporated concessions quite inconsistent with it.

The United States agreed to deliver to Mexico stated quantities of water, and undertook the whole cost of the works necessary to assure such deliveries. The treaty with Great Britain provided in some detail for the regulation of the border lakes, for the division of supplies of certain rivers, and in other cases for giving to individual riparians in the downstream nation the rights provided by domestic law of the upstream nation. This treaty was so framed as to exclude from its terms the controversial diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Chicago Drainage District, and to that extent may be said to have preserved Attorney General Harmon's position. While the controversy about this diversion persisted for many years, it has by now become largely moot because the U.S. Supreme Court, at suit of other riparian states, has imposed on the drainage district limitations which go far toward meeting such limitations as derive from international law. Wisconsin v. Illinois, 278 U.S. 367 (1929), 281 U.S. 179 (1930), 89 U.S. 395 (1933). Smith (at 52) suggests, however, that compensation for past damage is called for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may have a vote on the motion of the Senator from Maryland in 20 minutes; and that 10 minutes of the time be controlled by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and 10 minutes of the time be controlled by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, do I correctly understand the Senator to say it is the intention to keep the Senate in session?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Until we vote.

Mr. KUCHEL. Until after we vote?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Surely. We are trying to get a vote. I thought Senators were ready for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I was on my feet reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the action just taken be vitiated. I did not hear the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a moment to consider the proposal. We have not been consulted. We have been talking about this matter for some days. I do not like snap action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin was speaking for the group in opposition to the measure. The Senator has been asking for a vote. The minority leader was very anxious, also. I consulted both the proponents and the opponents of the bill. I did not consult each individual. If the Senator wants to extend the time, I would be glad to do it to suit his convenience. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin felt we ought to vote without any discussion.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thought so, too. For that I was ready. This surprised me. We are doing something other than voting.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We are providing for equal time. Does the Senator want more time than what we have allowed?

Mr. McNAMARA. I wanted to vote now. I was prepared to vote now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We cannot do that, because the Senator from Illinois wants 10 minutes. We can give the other side 10 minutes, to reply to the Senator from Illinois. Does the Senator want to change that?

Mr. McNAMARA. I will accept the explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas that there be 20 minutes allotted for consideration of the motion of the Senator from Maryland; with 10 minutes for each side? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN REAL PROPERTY TO SOPHRONIA SMILEY DELANEY AND HER SONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6) to provide for the conveyance of certain real property of the United States to Sophronia Smiley Delaney and her sons, which was, on page 1, line 7, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have consulted with the majority leader and the minority leader as to this matter.

I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], to refer H.R. 1 to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chair wishes to state that the unanimous consent agreement is in effect. Ten minutes are allotted to each side.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will yield 2 minutes, with the understanding that the time does not come out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is very generous.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly on the motion to refer the pending bill to the Foreign Relations Committee without any date being attached as to the time the committee should report.

This is, of course, a motion to kill the bill, and if it is adopted it will be as a result of the long discussion which the opponents of the bill have waged and the threat of further discussion if this motion is defeated. We are legislating, therefore, with a pistol held at our heads, and I do not believe in acceding to threats, either open or covert.

It should be noticed, Mr. President, that this measure clearly falls within the jurisdiction of the Public Works Committee, because on page 40 of the Rules of the Senate the jurisdiction of the Public Works Committee is stated to cover "oil and other pollution of navigable waters."

The bill has been four times referred to the Public Works Committee and four times reported by the Public Works Committee. Now, because Canada has raised certain objections, it is proposed by the Senator from Maryland to take it away from the Public Works Committee and refer it to the Foreign Relations Committee.

If we start adopting this precedent we will disorganize the internal management of the affairs of the Senate. For example, very frequently foreign countries object to our tariff provisions and to quotas which we impose on goods from foreign countries. Shall we therefore take the jurisdiction of tariff matters away from the Finance Committee and give it to the Foreign Relations Committee? We will have to do so if this precedent is adopted.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have only 10 minutes, and I would prefer to conduct my argument, and then the Senator, if he is opposed, can argue on his own time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am not opposed. I want to propose a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since I have only 10 minutes I would prefer, if I may to conduct my discussion in as orderly a way as possible.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I mean, I am not in opposition to the Senator. It is all right if he does not want to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A poverty-stricken person cannot be as generous as a millionaire, and since I have only 10 minutes, I hope the Senator will not think I am discourteous if I prefer to proceed in my own way, and to husband such little time as I have.

Foreign countries also object very frequently to our immigration policies. Does this mean that immigration bills shall be taken from the Judiciary Committee and given to Foreign Relations?

I submit, therefore, that from a procedural standpoint we are making a great mistake if we send this bill to Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, I know it is said that we should do this in behalf of good relations with Canada, and it is charged from time to time that in some fashion, never quite stated, that this bill violates the treaty of 1909 and the treaty of 1950. I have studied both of these treaties very carefully and it is apparent that this is not true.

The treaty of 1909 refers specifically as international waters to those lakes in which the international boundary line runs, and a casual inspection of the maps here behind us show that those lakes are Superior, Huron, Erie, and Ontario. The international boundary lines do run through those lakes, but the international boundary line does not run through Lake Michigan. Lake Michigan lies 37 miles east of the beginning of the boundary line.

The exclusion of Lake Michigan was deliberate from the 1909 treaty. Secretary of State Elihu Root in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee specifically stated that Lake Michigan was excluded.

So far as the 1950 treaty is concerned, that provided for the equal allocation of water flowing out from Lake Erie, but it did not prescribe any level in Lake Erie, nor did it prescribe any specific rate of flow in the Niagara River itself. It merely said that such water as was available was to be shared equally between Canada and the United States. So on a legal basis we are violating nothing whatsoever in passing this bill.

I know an appeal is being made that we should be generous to Canada. I want to be generous to Canada. I have opposed some tariffs and some quota systems which this administration has put into effect because I thought they treated Canada unfairly and unjustly, but we need to remember this, that we have already been extremely generous to Canada so far as the waters of the Great Lakes system are concerned.

In the original 1910 agreement Canada was given 36,000 cubic feet per second, the United States only 20,000. This was because Chicago at that time was given by the Secretary of War 10,000 cubic feet per second. In other words, Chicago's claim of 10,000 cubic feet, which had been perfectly legal and had been granted by the Secretary of War, was specifically recognized. Canada, therefore, was given a larger share of the residue than the United States received because of this very fact.

As time went on Chicago did not utilize its full 10,000 cubic feet per second. It cut down some of this amount voluntarily. Part of it was reduced by rulings of the Secretary of War and the Supreme Court, and each time that the share of Chicago was reduced we loyally obeyed. But, and this is the interesting point, Canada's share was not reduced. The United States did not claim for itself the amount which Canada did not use.

Canada in other words received all the share of waterpower which Chicago did not use. Furthermore we have been generous in giving to Canada without charge waterpower at Niagara which American private plants could not use. If we add up the total, of these gifts, we reach this startling fact: the commercial value of the waterpower to which Chicago and the United States were origially entitled, but which we did not use, and which has been turned over, therefore, to Canada, is in the neighborhood of $320 million. We have done this for Canada very gladly, because of our desire to be a good neighbor.

Now, Canada for internal political reasons which in the interests of international amity I shall not enlarge upon, comes in and objects to this bill because for 1 year only there is to be an added experimental diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second. As a matter of fact, this would lower the level of the Lakes Michigan and Huron by only one-quarter of an inch, and would lower the level of Lakes Erie and Ontario by between one-eighth and one-sixteenth of an inch. This is what the opponents of this bill are talking about in very piteous language when they debate upon the great evils done to Canada. The loss is in fact infinitesimal.

There is one further factor which should be noted. If Chicago is given the right to take a thousand cubic feet a second out of Lake Michigan, this will be a loss of only 235 cubic feet a second at Niagara. We have worked out the economic loss very accurately. It does not exceed $36,000 a year. In other words, Canada and her sponsors in this body have been making a mountain out of a mole hill. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] observed in his opening speech, the opponents have been hiding behind the skirts of our "Sister of the Snows" to the north of us.

The city of Chicago and the communities to the south of our city want to have this test made, to consider all aspects of the very difficult problem of dealing with the sewage of the great metropolitan community.

The city of Chicago has probably the best sewage disposal system in the world. It is able, by the most advanced processes, satisfactorily to dispose of 90 percent of this material. There is however an irreducible residual of about 10 percent. But since the city is handling the equivalent of 8½ million units, this means that the waste of 850,000 people is discharged into the Chicago River. We want to handle this problem as effectively as possible. We believe that a test of 1 year is necessary to do it in order to determine whether this is the best way to bring the needed additional oxygen into the water, for oxygen is the great purifier.

I therefore ask that this motion be defeated.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I dislike very much to disagree with my friend from Illinois, whom I regard as one of the great Members of the U.S. Senate. However, the fact remains that whether Canada was wise or unwise in opposing this diversion, the Canadian Government has opposed the proposed diversion.

I speak as a Senator from the Pacific Northwest who has taken a predominant interest in trying to prevent the diversion of the upper Columbia River. In 1955, I was assigned by the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to make a survey in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada of the position of the Canadian Government and Canadian opinion on this issue.

The Canadian Parliament has authorized a study of diversion of the upper Columbia. It has appropriated $250,000 for this purpose. A diversion has been proposed which would take out of the upper Columbia River a quantity of water equal to the entire flow of the Colorado River at Glens Ferry. If this were to occur, some of the greatest power projects ever built on the face of the earth would have a ceiling placed on their production, and they might be left stranded with respect to future production. I refer to Grand Coulee, Bonneville, Chief Joseph, and other projects.

We in the Pacific Northwest do not see how we can antagonize Canada with respect to Lake Michigan, in connection with a diversion which Canada disapproves, without risking diversion of the upper Columbia River, which would be so disastrous and perilous to our future development.

The Senator from Illinois is correct when he says that Lake Michigan is 37 miles from Canada. But we in Oregon have waters 300 miles from Canada; yet they would be affected by the diversion of the Columbia.

Lake Michigan is a part of an international waterway, the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system. Whether or not a particular body of water touches Canada or touches an international border has nothing to do with the fact that it is a part of the flow which stems from international waters.

Our beloved colleague from Illinois referred to Canada as "Our Lady of the Snows." I think that was Kipling's term.

Our Lady of the Snows and its government have protested the proposed Lake Michigan diversion. I am not competent to say whether or not Canada should protest the diversion, but the fact is that Canada has protested it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. NEUBERGER. May I have an additional minute?

Mr. WILEY. I yield 1 minute additional to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. We share with Canada the greatest single waterway for power production on the North American Continent, namely, the Columbia River; and I daresay that we cannot risk antagonizing Canada on Lake Michigan, without endangering the great power potential of the Columbia River, which is vital to our Pacific Northwest States.

I regret to have to take a position against this diversion, because I know how desperately Chicago needs the water. In 1958 I voted for the diversion, because the position of Canada was ambiguous, but I said that if Canada opposed the diversion, I did not see how a Senator from the Pacific Northwest could go along with it and seriously represent the great projects on the Columbia River. Our very survival is dependent on the good will of the Canadian Government.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, three times almost identical bills have passed the House. Twice such a bill has passed the Senate. The provisions of the present bill have been considerably reduced.

The bill calls for only a year's diversion. The subject has been thoroughly ventilated in the Public Works Committee. I doubt whether I have ever seen such penetrating interrogation of a witness as that conducted by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR]. The whole case was made there. Nothing particularly new has been added in the discussion here.

We talk on one side about loss of power and reduction in lake levels, and loss of commerce, but on the other side is the overwhelming effect of the health of millions of people. Other areas may be indifferent to health. I say, in all kindliness, that I noticed that in the State of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin the health authorities had to close several public bathing beaches because the waters have been contaminated. I am advised that as far north as Green Bay the people must go 20 miles for their drinking water, because of the contamination of the lake.

The people in the sanitary district and in Chicago, and Illinois, have laid out $400 million for treatment plants. They have never contaminated the lake water at any time.

We come here in good grace, and with perfectly clean hands, to ask for a resolution of the issue which is before us. Therefore there is no point in sending the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee. It passed the Senate twice before. It passed the House three times before. Let us have done with it now. Let us finally resolve the issue. Let us vote upon passage of the bill. I trust it will be favorably considered.

I hope, therefore, that the pending motion to send the bill to still another committee of the Senate will be defeated.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Senators have before them the report of the debates in the Canadian Parliament. They tell the story of the international picture. Let Senators kick Canada in the teeth if they so desire.

The Senator from Illinois made a diversionary remark. He spoke about the so-called condition in Milwaukee. The evidence shows plenty about the failure in Illinois to do the job after the court, on a number of occasions, had told them to clean their own house. Now they want to kick Canada in the teeth.

Senators may read the manuscript which has been placed on their desks. It has been in the offices of Senators for weeks, and now it is on their desks.

Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the statement has been made that the bill authorizes the diversion of only 1,000 second-feet of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway. The bill, authorizes the diversion of an average of 2,500 second-feet the year round. To be certain, I read from the bill:

> With respect to the regulation of flows along the Illinois River, particularly at Pekin, Illinois, the diversion authorized by this Act in accordance with this section will be regulated with the objective of maintaining a uniform flow at Pekin of eight thousand cubic feet per second.

The bill does not authorize simply the diversion of 1,000 feet a second. There is no limit to the diversion. It may be any amount up to 8,000 feet a second during the dry season.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILEY. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, concerning the comments by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] about the effect of the bill being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I see no reason why that should mean the end of the bill or the killing of the bill. The committee is not accustomed to burying bills. I assure the Senator from Illinois that the bill will receive serious consideration. I really think that following some negotiations with the Canadian Government, a reasonable procedure for the extraction of a reasonable amount of water for Chicago can be adopted.

What the Canadian Government objects to is not the extraction of some of the water. They object to its extraction without any agreement or any procedures which might restrict the abuse of such a practice in the future.

I see no reason to assume that because the bill may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that will be the end of the bill. I believe the committee will enlist the assistance of the State Department, that negotiations will take place with Canada, and that some reasonable procedure by which a reasonable amount of water can be used by the city of Chicago will be arrived at.

I myself think that Chicago should have consideration in this respect, but I am impressed by the argument that the procedure should not be unilateral; and also that if it is possible to take 1,000 cubic feet, it is possible to take 100,000 cubic feet, without any right on the part of Canada to interject her interests into the matter.

I think the interests of Canada arising out of the Seaway and the power development have changed the situation to such a degree that Canada has a legitimate interest in being consulted about this proposal.

I assure the Senator from Illinois that it is not my intention, as chairman of the committee, and I do not think it is the intention of any other member of the committee, to bury the bill. I am not insisting on its referral to the committee, but I think it would be good practice to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] to refer H.R. 1 to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that we do not expect to have any more votes taken this evening.

I shall ask the Senate to remain in session as long as may be necessary to acmodate any Senators who may desire to make statements for the RECORD. But we do not plan to have any more votes taken this evening.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am about to ask consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to extend Public Law 480; and I shall seek an agreement in that connection. But that bill will not be debated unless and until the conference report on the labor bill is debated.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 518, Senate bill 1748.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of Senate bill 1748, 30 minutes be available on each amendment, to be equally divided; and 2 hours be available on the bill, to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, does the proposed agreement include the committee amendments? There are certain committee amendments to the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the majority leader restate his request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that 30 minutes be allowed on any amendment, motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table—as is customary in our consent agreements—and 2 hours be allowed on the bill, to be equally divided.

I have consulted with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]; with the ranking minority member of the committee, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] who found that this amount of time would be agreeable to them. So far as I was informed, no other Senator desires to offer amendments; and they felt this arrangement would be adequate.

We do not plan to have the bill debated, under the proposed limitation, until the Senate has disposed of the conference report on the labor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although I have no objection—I must state that I have just now been advised that the Senator from New Hampshire asked to be notified, so he could be on the floor when such an agreement was proposed, I understand that he will soon arrive.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then I withhold the request, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas subsequently said: Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me, so that the question on a unanimous-consent request can be put, while the Senator from New Hampshire is present? We held up action temporarily on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, it is understood that the usual terms of the agreement will be printed in the RECORD, and I ask that it may appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement, as subsequently reduced to writing, is as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That during the consideration of S. 1748, a bill to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes, debate on any amendment, motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to thirty minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill debate shall be limited to two hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal. (September 2, 1959.)

RACIAL PROBLEMS IN LARGE CITIES WHICH HAVE FORCED INTEGRATION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, for several months now I have been bringing to the attention of the Members of the Senate the racial problems in New York and other large cities where forced integration has brought about a terrifying wave of rioting, crime, juvenile delinquency, and mounting hatreds and prejudices.

One of the reasons why I have been doing this is that some of the local press do not report these chronic ailments that accompany forced integration. In particular, I refer to the Washington Post, which has failed on many occasions to report locally the disturbing conditions that exist in cities where integration has been forced upon people.

The Governor of New York yesterday announced he was calling an emergency meeting of leaders of his State, and was also calling on Federal Bureau of Investigation Director J. Edgar Hoover for help and consultation in an effort to cope with widespread crime, rioting, and the other evils that have befallen New York City as a result of forced integration.

Mr. President, I could not find the item in the Washington Post this morning, and I had prepared remarks to criticize the Post for not carrying this article. However, late this afternoon, after an advance press release containing my prepared remarks had been distributed, a representative of the Washington Post called my office to advise me that reference to Governor Rockefeller's announcement was contained in a story in the Post on page B–8. I looked up this article and, sure enough, buried in a story entitled "New York Police Hunt Teenage 'Dracula,'" was reference to Governor Rockefeller's alarm over the situation in New York. However, this article contained no reference to the emergency meeting of government, religious, social, and other leaders called by Governor Rockefeller, and reported in large headlines in other papers across the country.

While the Governor of New York in his announcement was reluctant to admit that the crime, corruption, rioting, and other violence besetting New York City was a racial problem, the fact that he is calling in one of the heads of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People for advice on how to handle the crisis in New York is prima facie evidence that the problems of New York are of a racial nature. Leaders of the NAACP are experts in finding ways to force integration upon people, and know little about juvenile delinquency problems.

If it were a pure juvenile delinquency and crime problem in New York, I should think a consultation with FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, the Nation's top expert on juvenile delinquency and crime, would be sufficient consultation. The bringing in of the NAACP leadership by the Governor of New York should be sufficient evidence to the Nation that New York's problems result from integration as much as anything. Similarly, I would think that the troubles that have beset the Governor of New York should be a lesson to other proponents of integration across this land that they would do well to halt and look back before engaging in promoting more civil rights legislation and integration.

It is ironical indeed that the Nation's largest city, which houses the Nation's most vehement spokesmen for integration, has found it necessary to request Federal assistance to cope with its local crime problems; usually these spokesmen for integration and civil rights legislation are pointing their fingers at the South and calling on Federal officials to send the FBI and Federal forces into the South to force upon the South the very integration which is now the root of their own problems.

As the editor of the New York Daily News of September 1, 1959, said, "a lot of eager-beaver Members of Congress might do a lot worse than to listen to him," meaning the distinguished Senator HIRAM L. FONG, of Hawaii, who recently advised that Congress should be careful about rushing civil rights legislation onto the books.

Mr. President, I can think of no more tragic step that the Congress of the United States could take than for it, in this year of 1959, to pass civil rights legislation that would foster forced integration upon unwilling people across this land; while places like the city of New York have reached such a crisis in handling their own racial problems, living under their own civil rights laws, that they have found it necessary to call in Federal assistance to cope with the breakdown of law and order. We would do well, at the very least, to lay aside consideration of any civil rights legislation which would stir up this boiling pot of hatred and prejudice.

We need to let each community work out its own problems, in its own way. As the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, a State that has the most impressive mixture of races of any State in the Union, has said, "It is difficult to legislate a mode of life. I think this is an emotional problem that will be cured by time."

Mr. President, Hawaii grew up as an integrated Territory. The integration started as a natural phenomenon, and as a result today there is little trouble in that State, if any at all, where whites, Negroes, Hawaiians, Chinese, Japanese, and descendents of crossings of those races live together peacefully. In that State integration was a mode of life.

In large sections of our country, particularly in the South and in South Carolina, segregation is a mode of life. The "do-gooders" have attempted to make integration a mode of life in New York, an area where segregation has been the mode of life. We know the results today. The Governor of New York knows the results, and he has called for this drastic action to cope with the problems in that city. There could be no more obvious example to proponents of civil rights legislation to force integration upon unwilling people that they should not go forward with their program any more.

Mr. President, I ask that the editorial from the New York Daily News of September 1, 1959, entitled "Senator FONG on Civil Rights," be printed in the body of the RECORD, together with my remarks.

Mr. President, I also send to the desk an article from this morning's New York Times entitled "Governor calls emergency talks on youth crime," and ask that this article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily News, Sept. 1, 1959]

SENATOR FONG ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Senator HIRAM L. FONG, Republican, of Hawaii, says Congress should be careful about rushing civil rights legislation onto the books. Segregation, he says, is a tough problem, and "it is difficult to legislate a mode of life. I think this is an emotional problem that will be cured by time."

Coming from Hawaii, with its impressive mixture of races that get along together extremely well, Senator FONG should know what he's talking about—and a lot of eager-beaver Members of Congress might do a lot worse than to listen to him.

GOVERNOR CALLS EMERGENCY TALKS ON YOUTH CRIME—PARLEYS WILL BE HELD HERE WITH STATE AND CITY AIDS, CIVIC LEADERS, AND MAYOR—POLICE ACTION BACKED—WAGNER SAYS SITUATION IS BEYOND SOCIAL AGENCIES—EXTRA PATROLS ON DUTY

(By Peter Kihss)

Governor Rockefeller yesterday summoned two emergency meetings to intensify efforts against the city's rising juvenile violence. One of the meetings will be for State officials and the other will include Mayor Wagner and community leaders.

Meanwhile, the mayor declared that organized gang murders, such as those that took two lives in a West Side playground early Sunday, had become a problem for the police rather than social agencies.

He endorsed measures by Police Commissioner Stephen P. Kennedy that shifted nearly 1,400 policemen from other duties to patrol trouble areas. The augmented patrols began their tours last night.

AGENDA TO BE SET

Later, the Governor announced that he had telephoned Mayor Wagner and arranged for a preliminary conference with him tomorrow for Friday after the mayor holds a scheduled meeting with city officials on the same problem.

The Governor and the mayor will discuss an agenda for the second of the two meetings Governor Rockefeller has set up. Richard L. Amper, the Governor's press secretary, said Mr. Rockefeller had reported that Mayor Wagner had been very cooperative and approved of all this.

Mr. Rockefeller's first emergency meeting will be with a dozen State executives and legislative leaders tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. at his office, 22 West 55th Street. They will help prepare a list of topics for the second, still broader, conference with city and civic leaders scheduled for next Tuesday.

MAYOR'S PARLEY DUE

On Monday, Mayor Wagner had called a conference of city officials on the youth crime situation. This will be held tomorrow at city hall at 2 p.m.

To next Tuesday's sessions, at 10:30 a.m. at his office, Governor Rockefeller sent invitations by telegram to the mayor, Commissioner Kennedy, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and 17 other leaders.

Governor Rockefeller said yesterday morning during a ceremony installing new members of the State Harness Racing Commission and the Waterfront Commission that he was "deeply concerned both as the Governor and as a parent."

"We have to mobilize more effectively forces of private and State and local agencies," he said. "We have to constantly devise new ways to bring about a challenge to these young folks and to provide an outlet for their energies and give them a sense of belonging."

He said he was alarmed "in terms of human suffering and of these young people getting off on a wrong foot in life."

Then the Governor held a 2-hour meeting in his office here with State Attorney General Louis J. Lefkowitz, Robert MacCrate, the Governor's counsel; William J. Ronan, secretary to the Governor, and Mr. Amper.

The Governor then announced the two conferences with this statement:

"The recent occurrences of juvenile violence in the streets, and fear anxiety and heartbreak they have evoked are tragic to all of us. And they call for action by all of us—officials of government, parents and private organizations concerned with the welfare of our community.

"The problem of juvenile delinquency has no easy remedy. There is no quick or overnight solution. It is compounded of neglect by parents, broken homes, poor living conditions, unhealthy background, economic deprivation, mental disturbance and lack of religious training.

"There is no single approach to a solution. The attack must come at all levels—by parents, churches and synagogues, boys' clubs and other youth groups, settlement houses, the schools, social agencies, law enforcement agencies and the courts."

STATE AIDS INVITED

Among those invited to tomorrow's meeting with the Governor are Attorney General Lefkowitz; Raymond W. Houston, State Commissioner of Social Welfare; Paul D. McGinnis, State Commissioner of Correction; Dr. Paul Hoch, Commissioner of Mental Hygiene; Dr. James E. Allen, Jr., Commissioner of Education, and Russell G. Oswald, chairman of the State Parole Board.

The others are Mark A. McCloskey, chairman of the State Youth Commission; Elmer A. Carter, chairman of the State Commission against Discrimination; Senators Walter J. Mahoney and Joseph Zaretzki, majority and minority leaders of the upper house; Speaker Joseph F. Carlino, and Anthony Travia, Assembly minority leader.

For Tuesday's conference, telegrams of invitation went to the Mayor, Commissioner Kennedy, Mr. Hoover, and the following:

Cardinal Spellman, Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York; Rev. Dan Potter, executive secretary of the Protestant Council of New York; Rev. David Glovensky of the New York Board of Rabbis; Harry Van Arsdale, president of the Central Trades and Labor Council; Lester Granger, executive director of the Urban League; Thurgood Marshall, counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Joseph Monserrat, director of the Puerto Rican Labor Department office here.

Carl Loeb, president of the Community Council of Greater New York; Beatrice Quimby, executive director of the Federation of Protestant Welfare Agencies; Herschel Alt of the Jewish Board of Guardians; Rev. Robert E. Gallagher of Catholic Charities; J. Richardson Dilworth, president of the Community Service Society.

Mr. Lefkowitz, Mrs. Caroline Simon, State Secretary of State; A. Van W. Hancock, chairman of the New York State Commission on the White House Conference on Children and Youth; Chief City Magistrate John M. Murtagh, and Presiding Justices Bernard Botein and Gerald Nolan of the Appellate Division here.

DEFINITION OF "FILIBUSTER"

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate an editorial entitled "Snitching Great Lakes Water" appearing in the Washington Post this morning. The Washington Post editorial writer states in the editorial "a filibuster is a time-wasting device to prevent action by the Senate after all the arguments are in." My remarks at this time are not devoted to either side in the Great Lakes water diversion controversy but are directed to the Washington Post and its definition of a filibuster and its past record of charges concerning the use of the filibuster.

In this instance, the Washington Post has come to the defense of those undertaking lengthy discussion to explain their positions on the Great Lakes water diversion bill. The Washington Post says these Senators are not filibustering as has been charged and calls the situation the Senate now finds itself in "a vigorous discussion on a vital issue." As in the past, had this been a debate on civil rights legislation and any southerner or group of southerners were holding the floor to discuss at length a civil rights matter, the Washington Post would have by now printed a lengthy editorial blistering the southerners for filibustering.

I want the Washington Post to understand that when we southerners take the floor to discuss at length a vital issue that we are not filibustering but we are using the same legislative tools that are being used in the Great Lakes water diversion bill debate. I also wish to emphasize that we southerners have never felt that we have ever wasted time in our debating on civil rights legislation and since this is the definition of filibustering to the Washington Post, then I hope it will be as generous in its description of future civil rights debates as it has been on the Great Lakes water diversion debate.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SNITCHING GREAT LAKES WATER

Opponents of the Great Lakes water diversion bill are under charges of filibustering, but up to this point the debate seems to illustrate the basic difference between a filibuster and vigorous discussion on a vital issue. A filibuster is a time-wasting device to prevent action by the Senate after all the arguments are in. Though many arguments have been repeated in the debate on the water diversion bill, the net effect has been to alert the country and the Senate to the dangers of a measure that has been too little understood. What now appears to be a very large minority opposing the bill may become a majority.

The arguments for not rushing into a venture of this sort are very persuasive. Senator MCNAMARA pointed out that four cases involving water diversion from Lake Michigan are now before the Supreme Court and that a special master appointed by the Court will soon begin taking testimony on every facet of this problem. It is well to remember that Chicago's existing right of diversion stems from the Court's decree of 1930. Even if legislation should seem ultimately desirable, Congress could legislate to far better advantage after the Court has further spelled out the legal issues.

Another strong argument for not passing the bill now is that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has had no opportunity to study it. On Monday the Senate refused by a narrow margin to send the bill to Foreign Relations, but Canada's objections to the bill remain strong. It would be inexcusable to pass the bill without a full analysis of these objections and the impact that such action would have upon relations between the United States and Canada.

Sponsors of the bill try to justify riding roughshod over Canada's wishes regarding these international waters by saying that officials in Ottawa have shifted their position in the last year. Spokesmen for Canada deny this emphatically, but even if it were true we do not see that it would have any substantial bearing on the issue now before the Senate. There is no question whatever about Canada's present resentment over the effort to take water without her consent from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system jointly owned by the two countries, and it is current attitudes and policies that have to be reckoned with.

There are strong indications, moreover, that in any event approval of the bill by the Senate would be only a gesture. President Eisenhower would doubtless veto this measure as he has done in the case of two similar bills—in part because it would divert Canadian-United States water without any negotiations on the subject with Canada. It is said that some Senators are being urged to vote for the bill as a means of conciliating the sponsors because the President will prevent it from becoming effective. Surely the opposite reasoning ought prevail in a responsible legislative body. Since a veto seems inevitable, why would any Senator wish to antagonize our good neighbor to the north by a futile gesture that will serve no other purpose?

CRIME IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, there appeared in the Washington Post this morning an article entitled "Crime Here Is Assailed by Senator." This article dealt with my insertion in the RECORD yesterday of a Newsweek magazine article concerning crime in Washington and New York.

In this article the Washington Post said:

In citing the article's summary of several possible reasons for the increase in Washington street crime, JOHNSTON omitted Newsweek's reference to congressional failure to provide voteless Washington with sufficient policemen and an adequately manned juvenile court bench.

Mr. President, I wish to assure the Washington Post and Members of the Senate that I have always been in favor of providing the Nation's Capital with an adequate police force, but I do not believe that we can solve the problems of large cities such as Washington and New York with an endless stream of policemen. I do not mean that Washington does not need more policemen; that is for the Senate District Committee and other officials dealing with the District government's problems to determine. However, I do wish to emphasize we cannot solve the problems which create crime, racial hatred, prejudices, and other evils caused by forced integration.

In this connection, I wish to bring to the attention of the Members of the Senate that yesterday New York City's Police Commissioner Kennedy said he recognized the fact—and I quote him directly—that "strong law enforcement is only a very small part of the total picture, although a very important one," in attacking crime. He told the New York Times, in a news conference at New York police headquarters:

If you put a blue blanket (meaning a blanket of blue-clothed policemen) over a festering slum, you're not curing the underlying ill. It's a stopgap measure designed to permit all individuals, agencies and organizations to operate in a civilized community.

Mr. President, the underlying causes of the current troubles in New York, Washington, and elsewhere do not solely come from a lack of policemen, but go back to the practices in those communities which have created the conditions under which racial differences have been emphasized through forced integration.

I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRIME HERE IS ASSAILED BY SENATOR

Senator OLIN D. JOHNSTON, Democrat, of South Carolina, cited a national magazine article about crime in Washington and New York during an anti-integration speech in the Senate yesterday.

He based his remarks on two articles in the current Newsweek which reported the fatal gang warfare on New York's lower East Side and the experience of Representative CHARLES C. DIGGS, JR., Democrat, of Michigan, who witnessed a street assault here last month.

In citing the article's summary of several possible reasons for the increase in Washington street crime, JOHNSTON omitted Newsweek's reference to congressional failure to provide voteless Washington with sufficient policemen and an adequately manned juvenile court bench.

JOHNSTON said he hoped "every Member of the Senate will read these two articles and ponder the grave question raised by these statistics and these descriptions of conditions in America's largest city and in America's National Capital, two places where forced integration has been experimented with more than any other places in the United States."

The South Carolinian cited the articles in a plea against enactment of "more civil rights legislation that will force integration upon other areas in the Nation where it is not wanted."

STUDENT EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an excellent editorial from the Thursday, August 27, 1959, issue of the Tyler Courier-Times, of Tyler, Tex., commenting on the value of the student exchange programs be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BLESS YOU, EXCHANGE STUDENTS

One of the world's great hopes for peace and true progress on the human scene worldwide lies in the student exchange program between the United States of America and the various other countries of the globe.

Statistics are not at hand, but it is known that there are many thousands of foreign young men and young women in the United States today, looking forward enthusiastically to the opening of the new terms of schools, colleges, and universities.

Tyler and other east Texas educational centers have a goodly number of these students. They merge well. They help give new and greater meaning to the concept of the United States as the "melting pot" of civilizations.

And great good is accruing from the fact that thousands of young Americans are studying overseas. They are over there receiving, but they are also giving. They give a good and true picture of their homeland. They serve as fine examples of the human quality that is in the United States, despite its shortcomings.

The gains are reciprocal. We are coming into a greater respect for the other nations represented by the students coming into our midst. There is, perhaps imperceptibly to a large extent, a blending of great cultures. Differences in world opinions and concepts are being reconciled through this exchange of some of the world's finest young people—the hope of tomorrow if indeed not of today.

They're here from China, India, Germany, Turkey, Iran, and other areas of the Old World and from various countries of the Western Hemisphere.

Their numbers can be expected to increase as the years roll by. This should be. The worthy effect will continue to be a better buildup of friendship and understanding among the peoples of the world. With that achievement will come a greater measure of national and world progress materially, culturally, morally, spiritually.

Let us be sincerely grateful for these young students and their great potentials.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, when one reads an editorial like this, one is almost persuaded that at last we Americans are coming of age, that at long last we have grown up and may, from here on, act like responsible, mature adults.

But just as this happy glow of satisfaction began to spread across my brow, my eye was attracted by two other articles in the paper. The first announced that, because of a lack of money, denied to it by the House of Representatives, the Foreign Service Institute of the Department of State is not expanding its services, as planned, to take care of the minimum requirements of language training.

I ask unanimous consent to have that article printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Sept. 1, 1959]

EXPANSION OF FOREIGN LANGUAGE SCHOOL OFF

(By John Lawson)

Plans to expand the State Department's school of foreign languages have been shelved for lack of money.

The school, which is part of the Foreign Service Institute, had planned to add teachers and facilities for the teaching of an additional 70 Foreign Servce officers at its offices in Arlington Towers.

But because Congress failed to appropriate sufficient funds, the school will operate in 1960 about the same as it did in 1959.

Howard E. Sollenberger, dean of the school, said he had planned to expand operations "to bring the language training program closer to the target of 500 students a year in the basic world languages."

The school, he said, taught 380 students in 1959 French, Italian, German, Spanish, and Portuguese. In addition, he said, 50 students were taught in so-called esoteric languages.

Sollenberger said the school had hoped to teach an additional 70 students in the world languages and 20 to 30 students in esoteric languages.

The school's oversea operation, consisting of language classes at 170 foreign posts, would also have been expanded from its 1959 enrollment of 1,700 to about 2,000, he said.

Sollenberger said 7 additional tutors would have been hired in the Arlington school as well as about 70 part-time tutors for the foreign schools.

The school had requested $3.2 million for its fiscal 1960 operations. After Congress cut back the State Department's requests, however, the Department allotted the school $2.8 million.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The second story that attracted attention was accompanied by a picture of a luxurious Cadillac interior with deep folds of fur on the floor. The story under the picture read as follows:

For those aching feet. Comes now a minklined floor for custom-built autos which some of our more well-to-do citizens like to indulge in when they're not out shopping for 90-foot yachts. Custom car fancier Jay Bullen, of Tucson, Ariz., looks over the top-grade, silver-blue pelts, 150 in all, covering the floor of this Cadillac.

It is quite logical, therefore, that we simply cannot support a language institution for our representatives abroad and at the same time let our people have minklined floors for their Cadillacs.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 207 OF INTERNATIONAL CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT OF 1949, AS AMENDED, RELATIVE TO RETURN OF CERTAIN ALIEN PROPERTY INTERESTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a bill which proposes that section 207 of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 be amended.

I ask that the bill be appropriately referred, and I ask that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, as I now make a brief explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2634) to amend the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, as amended, relative to the return of certain alien property interests, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 207 of the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949, as amended, is amended as follows:

(a) At the end of subsection (b) add the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any provision of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, any person—

"(a) who was formerly a national of Bulgaria, Hungary, or Rumania; and

"(b) who, as a consequence of any law, decree, or regulation of the nation of which he was a national discriminating against political, racial, or religious groups, at no time between December 7, 1941, and the time when such law, decree, or regulation was abrogated enjoyed full rights of citizenship under the law of such nation, shall be eligible hereunder to receive the return of his interest in property which was vested under section 202 hereof or under the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, as the property of a corporation organized under the laws of Bulgaria, Hungary, or Rumania if 25 per centum of more of the outstanding capital stock of such corporation was owned at the date of vesting by such persons and nationals of countries other than Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Germany, or Japan, or if such corporation was subjected after December 7, 1941, under the laws of its country, to special wartime measures directed against it because of the enemy or alleged enemy character of some or all of its stockholders; and no certificate by the Department of State as provided under subsection (c) hereof shall be required for such persons."

(b) At the end of said section the following new subsection:

"(e) Interests in property vested under the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, as the property of a corporation organized under the laws of Bulgaria, Hungary, or Rumania shall be subject to the provisions of this section: Provided, That notice of claim for the return of any such interest has been timely filed under the provisions of section 33 of that Act. In the event such property or interest is no longer held by the officer or agency designated to make such returns, any property held by said officer or agency as owned by Bulgaria, Hungary, or Rumania or any national thereof may be used for the purpose of making returns under this subsection."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, this bill in its present form represents the product of the thoughts of the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and the executive departments of the wording of an amendment to eliminate certain inequities in the restoration of property rights to allied nationals and persecutees of the Nazis. Congress provided for return of the interests of these persons in property seized during World War II, in accordance with the position taken by this Government as expressed in the Brussels Agreement, signed September 5, 1947, which reads.

For the protection of the interests in the enterprises of nonenemy nationals, referred to in article 21 of this annex, the property to which this part applies shall, subject to the provisions of articles 23 and 24 of this annex, be released to the extent of those interests and pursuant to arrangements to be made between the parties concerned, if nonenemy nationals of parties directly or indirectly:

(i) own and, on September 1, 1939, owned 25 percent or more of the shares in the enterprise; or

(ii) control and, on September 1, 1930, controlled the enterprise.

Assistant Secretary of State McFall stated the principle involved in this agreement in a letter dated August 14, 1950, placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 17, page A5822, saying as follows with respect to the protection of nonenemy interests:

This is based on the principle which has been urged by this Government throughout the world that nonenemy interests in so-called enemy property are not properly subject to seizure as reparations.

Congress in the Trading With the Enemy Act provided for the return of directly owned interests of nonenemies and persecutees in property seized during World War II, and in the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 provided for the return of the proportionate stock interests of nonenemy nationals in corporations organized under the laws of Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania. However, the granting of relief to persecutees, and the application of the relief provisions to property owned by nationals of nonenemy countries in the form of stock interests in corporations organized in Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania whose property in the United States was not only blocked during the war and vested later, but was actually vested in the course of World War II, was inadvertently omitted.

The State Department favors the elimination of this inequity, and has suggested certain language which has been incorporated in the bill I am introducing today. Hearings have been held by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the subject, and no objection to the enactment of legislation to correct this omission has been received by the committee.

The first provision of the amendment would make former nationals of Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania who were persecuted by those governments during World War II eligible to claim their proportionate shares in properties of corporations organized under the laws of those countries if at least 25 percent of the stock in such corporation was owned by nonenemies and persecutees, or if the corporation was treated as enemy.

The second provision would make Bulgarian, Hungarian, and Rumanian property vested during World War II subject to the same principle as that vested thereafter and only blocked during the war, if timely claim had been filed, and in the event such property has been transferred out of the account in which it was carried on the books of the Attorney General, he would be authorized to use any other funds and properties vested and held by him under the act this bill amends for the purpose of satisfying the claims payable under the amendment for the return of property.

Since the Committee on Foreign Relations has received reports of the executive agencies and heard testimony on the subject matter of this bill, I hope the Senate can act on it without delay.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that none of the time used this evening be applied to the time under the unanimous-consent agreement, to which the Senate has already agreed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does the Senator refer to the extension of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, which is the pending business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. I have no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We did not expect to have it placed before the Senate this evening. Because of that and the amount of talk, I make the request.

Mr. JAVITS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EMERGENT AFRICA: CHALLENGE AND RESPONSE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, about 3 weeks ago the foreign ministers of nine independent States met in Monrovia, Liberia to discuss their common problems and aspirations. This significant but little publicized conference is a symbol of a new and dynamic Africa with which we must reckon in our consideration of world affairs.

A decade ago there were only three genuinely independent States in Africa: Liberia, Ethiopia, and the Union of South Africa. Today there are 10. And in 1960 four additional nations are scheduled for independence. No one can foretell what will happen by 1970.

A mighty drama is taking place in Africa. The great expectations for freedom and human dignity that swept across North America almost two centuries ago are now sweeping across the vast continent of Africa.

The people of Africa from Algiers to Capetown are yearning to breathe free. They are crying out for freedom—freedom from their colonial past, freedom from poverty and illiteracy, and freedom from racial discrimination.

If Cecil Rhodes of Great Britain is a symbol of 19th century colonial Africa, Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana and Tom Mboya of Kenya are symbols of the emergent Africa of the mid-20th century. Rhodes was a high-minded imperialist. Nkrumah and Mboya are high minded and responsible nationalists. Rhodes once said we must think in terms of continents. I am sure that Dr. Nkrumah and Mr. Mboya believe this admonition is even more relevant to the present era in Africa than it was to the colonial era. As Senators know, Nkrumah is Prime Minister of Ghana and Mboya is a member of the Legislative Council of Kenya as well as chairman of the All-African People's Conference. Incidentally, neither African leader has illusions about the menace of communism. What I have said about these two outstanding African leaders could be said of many others.

If the American people are true to their heritage, they will heed the cry for freedom and reach out in understanding to their fellow human beings in Africa who are asking only for a chance to walk erect and to enjoy the rights we in this blessed land take for granted.

WHAT AFRICANS WANT

There are two overwhelming aspirations which motivate the peoples of Africa. They want political self-respect and self-government. And they want the fruits of economic development. If they had to choose between the two they would choose self-respect and independence over economic gain.

The peoples of emergent Africa want to stand on their own political feet. They want to sever all colonial ties that imply political subordination to an alien power. This does not mean they are against all European connections, but only those ties which involve a master-servant relationship. The ties of partnership are welcome.

The peoples of emergent Africa know that genuine self-respect and political freedom are difficult to achieve without a higher living standard. Therefore, they want friendly assistance in helping to root out the ancient enemies of hunger, disease, and ignorance.

Most of all the people of Africa want understanding. Economic aid without understanding debases him who gives and him who takes. Aid extended with an understanding heart blesses him who gives and him who takes.

The American people cannot afford to be amused or frightened, unimpressed, or overawed by the fast-moving drama in Africa. The U.S. Government must take Africa seriously. The free world must understand the aspirations of emergent Africa and respond to these aspirations for freedom and dignity with a combination of speed and patience, imagination, and steadfastness. And a bit of generosity and humility would help too.

Considering our American experience, the peoples of emergent Africa have a right to look to us for understanding and help at this crucial hour in their struggle for a place in the sun. We cannot afford to betray their confidence in us and in our high ideals.

Mr. President, today I propose to speak of the challenge of Africa as that challenge confronts the United States. After a brief survey of the present situation, I will conclude with some recommendations for strengthening American policy toward Africa.

AFRICA: UNITY AND DIVERSITY

Since the end of World War II Africa has been "rediscovered" by Hollywood, big game hunters and best-selling novelists. It has been rediscovered in vague general terms, in sensational terms. But it has not been sufficiently understood in significant political, social and economic terms. It is barely known in human terms.

I propose to look at Africa in the larger context of world politics, where it is becoming a dynamic force which can be ignored only to our peril. If we do not see it in this larger context in Washington, we can be sure it is being considered in precisely these terms in Moscow and Peiping.

In my discussion about Africa I will speak of the continent as a whole. This approach has its dangers, because there are obviously great differences between the Arab and Moslem North and the vast area south of the Sahara. But I maintain that there is a deeper unity underlying the diversity.

The deeper unity is symbolized not only by the sinews of modern communication, but more significantly by meetings such as the recent one at Monrovia where common goals and heartaches were discussed. It is not insignificant that the Algerian dilemma was the main item on the agenda of the Monrovia meeting of foreign ministers. In fact, the nine independent states represented there urged France to withdraw her troops from Algeria, to end hostilities, and to enter into negotiations with the Provisional Government of Algeria.

THE RICHNESS OF AFRICAN HISTORY AND CULTURE

If we are to understand Africa, we must understand her in historical depth. The fact that the present is very important does not mean that the past is unimportant.

A common historical memory is a basic ingredient in nationhood. A proud past contributes to national self-respect. It is right and proper that the peoples are looking back even as they are moving forward. Their march toward freedom takes on its full meaning only when seen against the backdrop of history which preceded the colonial era. Nationalist leaders of today take justifiable pride in the great kingdoms and empires of an earlier era.

We all know that Western civilization had its beginning in Egypt and Sumer at least one thousand years before a comparable culture arose on the islands of the Aegean Sea and two thousand years before one was formed on the European mainland. It is still an open question whether the Queen of Sheba reigned in Ethiopia or in the southwestern extremity of the Arabian peninsula, but it is clear that a civilization of some consequence existed on both sides of the entrance to the Red Sea almost a thousand years before Christ.

Here are some other facts we are inclined to forget. About 600 years B. C., Carthaginians traveled from what is now Tunis to explore the West African coast. Ethiopia received Christianity before England did. And St. Augustine was a native North African.

While such facts are fairly well known, startling data developed by research and discoveries in the prehistorical period are little known or ignored. It is a fact, for instance, that the early peoples of eastern Africa possessed stone tools some hundred thousand years before inhabitants of Europe are recorded as having had them. Indeed, many anthropologists consider that findings in the southern part of the continent strongly suggest that Africa, rather than India or the Far East, was the first home of mankind.

The absence of documentary materials for the period prior to European exploration and settlement admittedly has left a gap which new interest and new methods of historical research in Africa have only begun to close. Archaeological discoveries, much greater use of Arabic sources, and increasing evidence of the unusual reliability of African oral traditions have combined to lift at least a corner of the veil of our ignorance about Africa in medieval and modern times. We are learning more and more about the great Negro and Arab empires—of Mali, Songhai, and Ghana—that covered much of west Africa in that period. We know that caravan routes, as well as territorial struggles, linked the north Africans with Negro peoples south of the Sahara throughout the Middle Ages. During much of that time the southern Mediterranean shore was transmitting the highest of cultural achievement. Knowing that even today northern Nigeria retains its ties with the Sudan to the east, it comes as less of a surprise to find a Fulani tribesman possessing the chain mail of a crusader knight.

There remains much more that we do not yet know—including the origin of the great ruins at Zimbabwe in Rhodesia. But enough has been revealed to permit one of our foremost scholars to state:

> The stereotype of African societies as static entities has little validity * * * the modern dynamic of Africa, so widely regarded as the result of contact with Europe, is in reality the continuation, in intensfied form, of something that has marked the flow of African experience from very early times. * * * We are learning that Africa was an integral part of the Old World, that it was culturally a donor as well as a recipient; in short, that it played a full role in the drama of the development of human civilization in general.

These are some of the reasons why African Negro leaders are gaining a new pride and confidence from their antecedents. A new appreciation of their past gives added strength to their just demands for equality of treatment among other peoples, and the vehement rejection of any doctrine that the color of a man's skin makes him inherently inferior or superior.

At the same time, these factors in large measure are responsible for the new interest in Africa shown by many of our 16 million Americans of African ancestry, who for years deprecated or ignored their supposed savage origins.

Let us move on to a consideration of what has been happening throughout the African continent.

THE INDEPENDENT STATES OF NORTH AFRICA

First of all, with the obvious exception of Algeria, every North African country bordering the Mediterranean has gained its independence since World War II. These four are Libya, Tunisia, Morocco, and Egypt, whose nominal independence became real with the overthrow of the monarchy and the withdrawal of British influence.

The case of Libya, given its freedom by the United Nations in 1950, has been of the utmost significance. Here a new nation was formed by the artificial melding of three distinct areas and some other desert lands into a state, based upon the boundaries of earlier Italian colonization, rather than upon prior existence as a nation. Furthermore, Libya in 1950 was possibly the poorest and most barren independent nation on earth; a distinction now to be relinquished following discoveries of oil.

Small wonder then that people throughout Africa asked if their own territories were not ready for independence if Libya was. By the way, the Kingdom of Libya, with quite a few million dollars of aid annually—predominantly from the United Kingdom at first, but now largely from the United States—has held together and made considerable progress toward internal consolidation.

A TOTAL OF 10 INDEPENDENT STATES

The addition of the Sudan, Ghana, and Guinea to the ranks of independent states makes a total number of 10. The other seven are the four north African countries plus Ethiopia, the Union of South Africa, and Liberia.

Along the way the former Italian colony of Eritrea has virtually lost its identity through federation with Ethiopia. Also, a popular plebiscite in British Togoland, held under United Nations supervision, joined that area to Ghana in 1957. Thus, in effect, the European colonial powers have withdrawn from no less than nine African areas since World War II.

FOUR NEW STATES SCHEDULED FOR 1960

The trend toward national independence is gathering momentum. In 1960, four more countries will be granted independence, and yet another territory is likely to merge with one of those four. First and foremost of those is the Federation of Nigeria. Nigeria's 35 million people give it the largest population of any African country, and great power potential if its three self-governing regions devote the utmost effort toward supporting and improving their federal institutions.

The neighboring French Cameroons will also become an independent republic, and the little strip of British Cameroons territory between it and Nigeria will probably elect to join one of the two larger states. The tiny autonomous Republic of Togo on Ghana's eastern border, and the territory of Somalia—formerly Italian Somaliland—in the eastern Horn of Africa complete the list for 1960.

Three factors are noteworthy in connection with these four independent states to be. First, all these areas but Nigeria are now United Nations Trust Territories. Their achievement of independence will leave the U.N. with direct responsibility for only two remaining trust territories; Tanganyika, in British east Africa, and Ruanda-Urundi, adjoining and administered in conjunction with the Belgian Congo.

Second, despite the best efforts of all concerned, Somalia because of poverty and Togo because of size, are perhaps less "ready" for independence than a number of territories still under colonial control. Some people maintain that U.N. standards and actions are too liberal. I would rather take that risk than the risk of ultraconservative policies which impose unrealistic standards for independence.

Third, all these candidates for independence in 1960 possess a common problem arising from a conflict between the more politically active peoples of the coast and the traditional and tribal authorities of the interior. In Nigeria and the French Cameroons in particular this conflict is compounded by the religious elements in those differences. It is this common problem that Prime Minister Nkrumah of Ghana has felt it necessary to attack so vigorously.

THE FRENCH COMMUNITY

The most dramatic policy shift by a colonial power in recent times was the creation last year of the French Community, further proof—if any were needed—of President de Gaulle's broad vision. While Guinea voted for full independence the 13 other tropical African territories of France—including Madagascar—have chosen to become autonomous republics—that is, fully self-governing on a local basis—within the French community.

It is likely that the territories of the former French Equatorial Africa will be content with their present status for some time to come, especially since they so greatly need the French financial aid which would likely be forfeited by a choice of independence. Satisfaction with the current situation is much less likely to endure in the republics of former French West Africa, some of which already are being attracted by ideas for a consolidation of the emerging independent West African states. Indeed, one West African leader has just called for a transformation of the Community into a "French Commonwealth."

THE BELGIAN CONGO

Another dramatic event has been the recent reversal of Belgium's policy, resulting in the promise of eventual independence for the Belgian Congo. Progress is readying neighboring Ruanda-Urundi for independence is likely to be speeded up by this development.

BRITISH AFRICA

In British Africa, both Sierra Leone and Tanganyika are now making steady progress toward self-government, and Uganda will be granted independence whenever an unquestioned majority of its inhabitants clearly demand it. Two points are worth noting here. First, in Tanganyika, where a liberal British policy has resulted in national elections and much improved relations between the African nationalists and the colonial administrators, the encouraging situation contains a valuable lesson for neighboring Kenya.

Second, the highly complex and confused situation in Uganda shows that colonial policy is not always the most significant barrier to the achievement of independence by an African territory. Indeed, where a colonial power withdraws too gracefully or suddenly from an area which has no history as a nation, it may rule out its use as a target of hostility which helps to promote national solidarity.

THE DARKER SIDE OF THE PICTURE

Most of what I have described presents a fairly encouraging picture. The situations in Kenya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland are a good deal less promising, although not entirely without hopeful elements. The general British policy of relaxing colonial controls as quickly and steadily as possible has run up against the white settler problem in both Kenya and the Federation.

In Kenya a few thousand estate owners in the so-called "white highlands," who admittedly have worked hard and suffered much to hold their properties, have greatly inhibited the growth of African political representation and responsibility. London has agreed to review Kenya's constitution which fixes the proportion of Africans in government, but demands for greater political independence continue to outpace British concessions by a wide margin and tend to nullify the concessions.

Strict controls are still maintained against the formation or extension of African political movements in Kenya. All experience in recent years shows that if moderate and responsible nationalists, like Tom Mboya, do not receive recognition and cooperation, they must either become more immoderate themselves or give way to extremist successors. It is most unfortunate that reasonable and talented African leaders in Kenya, such as Mboya and Kiano, are given little or no help to retain their prestige among their followers.

Kenya's weak economy also presents a serious problem. Its solution conceivably might be federation with Uganda and Tanganyika, but this seems out of the question until African predominance is established in all three territories. It is clear that a promise of independence, accompanied by a definite timetable, is the only realistic alternative to further unrest and disorder in Kenya.

The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland looks at the question of independence in quite a different light. Southern Rhodesia, the dominant member of the Federation and with two-thirds of its white citizens, hopes to achieve complete independence within the Commonwealth at a constitutional conference next year. Most Africans in the Rhodesias fear that loss of protection from the United Kingdom would mean the end of their relative political and economic advances within the Federation. The grouping of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland in 1953 was intended to provide economic benefits for the latter—which it has done—and to solve the race problem through a policy of racial partnership—which it has unfortunately failed to do. It is much too soon to say that the experiment, and thus the Federation, has failed. It is also too early to make a full assessment of the origin and the significance of the Nyasaland riots earlier this year, even though it has become clear that the local official reaction was unjustifiably severe. It is possible, however, to state that strong British policies and greater degree of Rhodesian cooperation will be needed to hold the Federation together and give it a real chance of eventual success.

PORTUGUESE TERRITORIES

The African scene becomes a great deal more gloomy as we turn to the Portuguese territories, primarily Angola and Mozambique. Portugal has prevented any close examination of the consequences of its colonial policies by declaring its African territories integral parts, or provinces, of the colonial government, thereby sidestepping the responsibility of reporting on its colonies to the U.N. There is no question, however, about the actual status of the natives, who are exposed to repressive measures as severe as any employed in Africa today. The few thousands of Africans who have risen in status have done so by completely losing touch with their people by becoming assimilated Portuguese.

The Portuguese, in company with the Spanish and the Arabs, are happily free of racial prejudice. They have a long history of intermarriage with subject peoples, but they practice an acute form of cultural segregation. Although the Portuguese territories have been largely sealed off from external liberalizing influences, they inevitably will soon be feeling the impact of African nationalist fervor on their borders.

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

One cannot look at the Union of South Africa without a sense of impending tragedy. There is no possibility that the 3 million whites would leave their land, and economic considerations make it extremely unlikely that there will ever be more of a separation of the races than is currently envisaged in the partial degree of apartheid now being enforced. In this situation, there appears little prospect of anything but increased mutual hostility between the races. One can only hope that there will be no explosion before the futility of present policies is made evident and the leaven of other African influences can reach South Africa. This is a sad irony because the Union has achieved a higher educational and technical level than any other African state.

A clear-cut case can be made against the Union's policy toward the territory of South-West Africa. The Union of South Africa was given a League of Nations mandate over the area after it was captured from Germany during the First World War. Unlike every other country with mandate responsibilities, the Union refused to acknowledge the U.N. Trusteeship Council as the inheritor of the League's obligations. The Union remains adamant on this score, and governs South-West Africa much as it does its own territories. It can be positively stated that vehement international protests are entirely justified; there is no question of intervening in a country's domestic affairs, and the situation is an affront to the dignity and conscience of the world community.

THE DILEMMA OF ALGERIA

The problem of Algeria is a most complex and heartrending one. Almost 5 years of bloody guerrilla war have drained the strength of both sides, reduced already low Algerian living standards to the starvation point and produced well over 100,000 refugees. These refugees in Morocco and Tunisia are a heavy burden on these newly independent people who are waging an uphill fight to achieve economic progress.

The war has also encouraged extreme Arab nationalist tendencies, and has promoted even stronger anticolonial sentiments in much of Africa as a whole. Extremist minorities up to now have succeeded in blocking long-overdue progress toward a solution in the best interests not only of France and Algeria, but also of the entire free world. Yet all the evidence increasingly indicates that the great majority of both the French and the Algerian peoples are thoroughly fed up with the conflict and would accept a compromise settlement, if one is permitted to emerge. Now that events seem to be building up to a climax which will involve all Nations, whether they wish it or not, there is an urgent need for the genuine friends of those caught in this bloody and senseless struggle to make a determined effort to help bring it to a close. I shall have more to say about Algeria later on in these remarks.

THE NATURE OF AFRICAN NATIONALISM

African nationalism today, as we have noted before, is symbolized by Prime Minister Nkrumah of Ghana and Tom Mboya of Kenya. There are two central elements in the kind of nationalism these statesmen represent. First is the clear call for political freedom and self-determination. Second is the equally clear insistence that Africans throughout the continent must work together to achieve their common aspirations. This second element is sometimes identified by the term "pan-Africanism."

It is important to note that nationalism and self-determination are not the same thing. The term nationalism can be rightly employed only where the movement for self-government has a national basis. Yet it is obvious that there are some so-called nationalists who represent no nation—that is, they represent no people with a common historical memory, with a common heritage, with a common culture. These nationalists are really spokesmen for pan-Africanism. They want a free Africa and are not so concerned about the precise political subdivisions within the continent. These leaders maintain that the African personality cannot emerge and flower until foreign rule is withdrawn from the entire continent.

The several Accra Conferences, which have brought together leaders of independent African states as well as representatives from political groups in many of the African territories, have played a key role in spreading nationalist and pan-African doctrines and enthusiasm throughout Africa. Even an old established independent country like Ethiopia has been affected by the new spirit of freedom running like an electric current through Africa.

By studying the careers and pronouncements of men like Nkrumah and Mboya we can get an authentic clue to the aspirations and possible future course of African nationalism. These men are moderate and responsible, moderate in the political means they employ and advocate, and responsible in their judgments of the international situation. They know what communism is and what communism wants. They know what the United States stands for. They know there is a great struggle between two alternative ways of organizing human society. In short, they know the political facts of life and deserve our sympathetic understanding, encouragement, and support.

But it would be a great mistake for us to assume that the newly independent African states will adopt anything but a neutral position in the struggle between the Communist world and the Western coalition. The African nations south of the Sahara will doubtless follow a course very much like that of Nehru's India. I see no reason why our Government should be disturbed if these nations coming into freedom choose to adopt a policy of nonalinement in the present struggle. Their commitment is to freedom and independence.

It would also be a great mistake if we would expect the new African states to adopt our version of democracy, which happens to be the most complex and difficult system of government in history. The existing independent African countries include a wide variety of governmental systems: absolute monarchy, oligarchic republic, military dictatorship, constitutional monarchy, authoritarian republic, and so on. Undeniably there are certain democratic elements in African societies, but they will be reflected in ways peculiar to Africa. Indeed, it is most likely that entirely new political systems will evolve as African leaders not only seek out and adopt the best and most suitable of their traditions and values, but also adapt their rule to the difficult problems to be faced.

NEED FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Now I wish to turn to the urgent need for economic development in Africa, a need recognized by all nationalist leaders. This need is so obvious that it requires little elaboration. But perhaps a few figures will help to drive the point home. Three-quarters of Africa's 220 million people—the highest proportion in any continent—are engaged in subsistence agriculture. Yet most of Africa's soil is not fertile. Its agricultural productivity is the lowest of all the continents, when measured by person or by acre. The raw materials picture is considerably brighter, but—as evidenced by the fall of prices in 1957—Africa cannot achieve economic growth without sustained world demand for its primary products.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that significant mineral production takes place only in certain areas, most of which are under colonial or South African control. The plight of a country like Somalia, with virtually no competitive export commodities, would be little short of desperate without external aid.

The need for economic development is also vital to the newly independent countries on political grounds. As the economies of the African territories have shifted to a money basis, the people have come increasingly into contact with the material goods produced by modern industrial societies, and naturally they want some of the fruits of our technical age. The nationalist movements are regarded by the African peoples, with encouragement from their leaders, as the best means of gaining such benefits. If higher living standards do not follow independence, the political leaders who embrace free political institutions will find it difficult to retain power.

TRADE AND INVESTMENT

In terms of economic factors, the future relationship of Africa with Western Europe is very significant. It is extremely important to both continents that close and mutually profitable trade ties be maintained. Western European imports from, and exports to, Africa amount to some $4 billion annually each way. In spite of Africa's relative poverty, it is a better market for Europe than is the United States.

Moreover, the colonial powers until recently have been investing almost $600 million annually in their African territories, with France making the largest contribution. In addition, the Common Market countries in 1957 created a joint 5-year development fund of $581 million for the African territories as a part of the Eurafrica concept. This has not been pure gain because the expected level of regular investment has fallen as the fund has come into effect. Nevertheless, these figures illustrate the size of the gap that would result if European investment were stopped or seriously curtailed. There is no question but that the Soviet bloc would be quite ready to step into that gap, and probably in a dramatic way.

DANGERS OF COMMUNIST PENETRATION

Soviet interest in Africa clearly has been increasing and at a fast rate. Africa's current economic weakness and racial conflicts provide ample opportunities for Communist penetration. Yet there appears to be little likelihood that any African country will adopt communism in the foreseeable future. On the other hand, it seems probable that the influence of the U.S.S.R. as a great power will carry increasing weight with the independent African states. Soviet bloc penetration is being intensified through diplomatic measures, trade missions, economic credits and educational grants. Moreover, the U.S.S.R. gains a substantial propaganda advantage from its free-wheeling blasts at racial discrimination or prejudice wherever it exists in Africa, or where it is directed against Negroes in Western nations like the United States. These are serious developments, but I consider it unlikely that the U.S.S.R. will gain a dominant influence over any African country in the future so long as we do not default on our responsibilities and opportunities.

There are many observers who believe it more likely that Communist China would serve as an example to the emergent African states. Here again, if the United States continues its efforts to ensure the success of India's economic experiment, we need not fear Communist China's powers of attraction. It is a fact that Nehru and his great country currently have far more prestige and influence in Africa than any other Asian state.

Against this background, Mr. President, I would like to say a few words about U.S. policy toward the African Continent.

AMERICA'S INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Now let us face the crucial question for the United States—what are our interests in Africa? In answering this question I prefer to use the term involvement rather than interest because the word interest often has a one-sided connotation. The simple fact is that we are already deeply involved in Africa. We are morally involved. We are economically involved. And we are politically involved.

We cannot escape this involvement with the peoples of Africa even if we would. The real problem has to do not with the fact of our involvement, but with the quality of our involvement. We can be involved responsibly or irresponsibly. If we are involved responsibly, the legitimate interests of both the United States and of Africa will be well served. If we are involved irresponsibly, the interests of both will suffer.

We Americans are inescapably involved with the present aspirations and future achievements of Africa in four closely interrelated ways. Let me consider each in turn.

First. We are morally and politically involved with Africa because we share the same aspirations for freedom and the good life. Our whole history makes us partisans of those African leaders who are seeking greater freedom for their people, freedom from external domination, freedom from grinding poverty. For many years we have expressed our humanitarian concern by sending large numbers of missionaries, educators, doctors and representatives of charitable foundations to Africa to help the Africans to help themselves to a fuller life. Now we must supplement this concern with moral support for political freedom and economic development.

Second. We are racially involved with Africa because Africa is second only to Europe as the source of America's population. Sixteen million of our citizens have African ancestors. More important than this historical fact, however, is the ugly fact of racial discrimination in the United States and in certain areas of Africa. Our whole approach to Africa is deeply affected by how America treats her Negro citizens. All Africa, and all Asia for that matter, follow our efforts to root out racial discrimination and segregation. To them Little Rock is a symbol of racial arrogance, just as the Supreme Court decision of 1956 is a symbol of our sense of justice. Most Africans believe that our sense of justice will eventually overcome our prejudice, but they sometimes become impatient with the pace of progress toward genuine equality of opportunity for all our people regardless of race, color, or creed.

In this area of racial discrimination the classic distinction between domestic policy and foreign policy has been rendered obsolete. We have made important strides toward greater equality in the past two decades. We must continue in this direction if we want to merit the faith and the hope that has been placed in us.

Third. We are economically involved with Africa. We often try to forget that our first contact with Africa was economic—the purchase of slaves to work for us. Our humanitarian concern for Africa in the past century is in part an attempt to assuage this lingering burden of guilt.

More important today is the fact that we are a highly developed and wealthy Nation and we have an obligation to relate our wealth to the poverty of the underdeveloped areas in ways that benefit both. This means increased trade and investment, as well as direct grants and loans under circumstances which merit that approach. Our economic relations with Africa will not be a one-sided affair because we need many of the raw materials she can supply. And she needs the capital goods and technical know-how we can provide.

Fourth. We are politically involved with Africa. All aspects of our involvement are both political and moral. They are political because they cannot be divorced from the great struggle in which the world is involved. They are moral because it makes a great deal of difference which side prevails in that struggle. This does not mean that the object of our policy toward African states is to line up allies for our side. It means rather that we should seek to help the emergent states to develop viable and responsible governments which can serve the needs of their people and withstand external pressures to subvert them.

We hope that a genuinely free nation will never out of spite sell itself into a new imperialism which is far more destructive of human values than the old imperialism.

Some African states, notably in North Africa, are directly involved in the strategic defense system of the western coalition. In dealing with these states we should be sensitive to their domestic needs and should never fall into the habit of taking them for granted or of using them for our purposes against their will.

Against this backdrop of our involvement in Africa, Mr. President, I would like to conclude my remarks with a number of suggestions for strengthening our policy toward Africa.

NEW POLICIES FOR A NEW ERA

At the outset I want to commend the administration for giving increasing attention to Africa. We have been moving in the right direction, but I submit that we have not been moving fast enough to keep up with the pace of events. We do not have a real sense of urgency. We have not yet fully grasped the significance of Africa in the unfolding drama of world politics. We may be in danger of approaching Africa with too little and too late. When I say "too little" I am not talking primarily in material and quantitative terms, but rather in moral and political terms.

Let me suggest several priorities in our approach to Africa, guidelines to a positive, and I believe imaginative, policy, worthy of our great heritage and adequate to the challenge we confront. I will indicate these priorities in the present tense imperative.

First. The United States should approach Africa with a deep understanding of the present aspirations and past achievements of the African peoples. We should approach the countries of Africa as friends and partners in a common quest for human dignity, not a patronizing, but in a spirit of neighborliness. We should not be ashamed of our ideals and humanitarian tradition. Nor should we be embarrassed if humanitarian and security objectives sometimes coincide in our national policy.

Second. The United States should develop a unified and coordinated long-range policy toward Africa as a whole. We should recognize the fundamental unity of Africa which underlies its rich diversity. The peoples of Africa are united by their common quest for freedom. The peoples of Africa are united in their common quest against poverty, disease, and illiteracy. Our strategy should be bold enough to encompass the continent and sensitive enough to honor the great diversity in cultural, social, economic, and political life within it.

Third. The United States should look upon Africa as a fresh opportunity to develop a comprehensive and positive diplomatic approach. In addition to sending traditional diplomatic officers to newly independent states, we should immediately send teams of qualified specialists in the fields of agriculture, labor, education, medicine, economics, public administration and the like, to supplement the classical diplomatic representation. These persons representing the breadth of our relations with emergent Africa should also reflect the cultural and racial diversity of our own population.

In this era of total struggle and total diplomacy, food, medicine and books, along with economic aid and technical assistance, are indispensable foreign policy instruments. In some cases these less traditional instruments may be decisive.

Fourth. The United States should increase substantially its cultural and educational exchange activities with Africa. Cultural exchange is an important road to mutual understanding and we should encourage it. Of all the aspects of a well rounded exchange program, education is the most vital for Africa at this crucial period. A higher level of literacy and technical education is a prerequisite to economic development, which in turn is a precondition to higher living standards.

Our Government is performing a great many worthwhile tasks in the educational field through its State Department programs, including those of ICA and the International Educational Exchange Service. But we have not done enough. Restricted budgets and lack of flexibility have prevented many Africans from receiving the help we should be extending.

Until very recently the number of Africans who came to America for study numbered only in the hundreds. During the last academic year, 1958–59, however, a total of 1,154 students from African countries south of the Sahara were enrolled in American universities and colleges. This compares favorably with only 114 African students in America just 10 years ago.

Last year more than a hundred students each from Ethiopia, Ghana, Liberia, Nigeria, and the Union of South Africa studied in the United States. Thirteen countries sent less than ten students. I do not know how many African students are studying in the Soviet Union, but from what I saw at the Moscow airport last winter, I would be surprised if it were not significantly larger than the number who are here.

The volume of our student exchange program should be increased tenfold.

The benefits from such a program would be mutual. Let me cite an example of the educational requirements of a newly independent state. President Sekou Toure of Guinea recently told Claude Barnett of the Associated Negro Press that his country would like to send several hundred students to the United States right now, and would be glad to receive 500 American students in Guinea if it were possible.

Few people realize the enormous efforts and sacrifices the Africans themselves are making to deal with their educational problem. Forty percent of Nigeria's eastern regional government budget, for example, is devoted to education, and yet the people are required to pay school fees in addition. Frankly, I wish we had something of the same spirit toward education in America.

Fifth. The United States should accelerate and strengthen its technical assistance program in Africa. A sound technical aid program contributes to short-range welfare goals as well as to long-range development objectives.

Our assistance to Africa under the mutual security program has been gradually rising. It will amount to roughly $110 million for the coming fiscal year; almost $21 million is slated for technical cooperation, and the much larger portion will provide special assistance for development projects. Through this program schools have been established to provide badly needed agricultural and vocational skills. Better use of scarce water supplies is being demonstrated; and health measures to eradicate debilitating diseases are being instituted.

A stepped-up program of such aid in the areas of agriculture, water resources, health, education, vocational training and public administration will give a real boost to newly independent states seeking to meet the welfare requirements of their people and at the same time will help to broaden the base for solid capital development. The time has come to recapture the original fervor of President Truman's "bold new program" which was widely hailed in underdeveloped areas when it was first announced a decade ago.

Sixth. The United States should help to encourage economic development in Africa by increasing the flow of trade and investment capital. The trading possibilities with African countries should be thoroughly explored. Since in the United States trade is a free enterprise, the Government can only indirectly affect its flow. This perhaps puts us at an immediate disadvantage with the Soviet Union where trade is carried on under a state monopoly and is frankly regarded as an instrument of international politics. Nevertheless, there are some things the Government can do to encourage international commerce.

In the field of capital investment our Government can and has taken considerable initiative. We have a policy of actively assisting private investors to find favorable investment opportunities in Africa. Further, the Development Loan Fund has approved loans totaling about $29 million to five African countries, and the Export-Import Bank is doing even more.

When we count United Nations assistance programs and the activities of the World Bank, both of which involve United States participation, the requirement of the independent African states for developing aid and investment capital are being met only in the most minimal way. We are extending assistance only on a "keeping the head above the water" basis.

In this connection I am delighted with the recent news that the administration is definitely going to propose the establishment of a new International Development Association to be created precisely for the purpose of providing long-term, low-interest loans to underdeveloped countries. This new agency would be able to make loans on terms which existing lending agencies of the free world cannot match. I note that the Government proposes an initial capitalization of $1 billion for a 5-year period, with our share being $320 million. I am happy to say in passing that the author of the International Development Association idea is a Member of this body, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and that I have supported the idea ever since it was proposed in 1958. I am sure that Africa will benefit from the new agency.

The creation of such an international agency does not mean that we should stop giving serious consideration to the establishment of a regional development organization for Africa. We probably need both agencies. An African Development Organization could be constituted directly under the aegis of the United Nations, perhaps in conjunction with the recently created U.N. Economic Commission for Africa. The important thing would be to have as members the United States and other industrialized countries with surplus investment capital.

Such a regional organization might well include the full membership of the OEEC and perhaps Japan. As I see it, the organization would not be confined to providing economic assistance, but would survey requirements and assist in drawing up sound plans and development projects. This is not a new proposal, but it might as well be for all the attention that the administration has given it.

Such a marshaling of free world resources through a regional or an international agency would fulfill Africa's needs and our responsibilities in a way not possible on an ad hoc and unilateral basis. These multilateral efforts would benefit both the independent African states and the territories still under colonial control, and participation would be sufficiently broad and varied to obviate African fears of colonial domination.

Seventh. The United States should review its policy toward political developments in Africa. Our cultural and economic approach to Africa has been going in the right direction. This is all to the good. But our efforts thus far have not been adequate to the challenge we confront.

Of our political and diplomatic approach, not even this much can be said. Our voting record at the United Nations on African problems seems to be stalled on dead center. When we are confronted with a decision on the Portuguese territories, the Union of South Africa, or South-West Africa, we seem to forget our traditional principles of freedom and human dignity.

A frozen position is neither good morals nor good politics. Our delayed and ambiguous response to Guinea's request for aid early this year, for example, made it easier for that country to accept the generous assistance offered by the Communist bloc.

Such unimaginative and conservative responses to the challenges of emergent Africa suggest the conclusion that the vigorous railsplitters of the 1850's have become the stolid fence-sitters of the 1950's.

Mr. President, I have reserved the most controversial problem until the very end—the Algerian dilemma. All the drama, pathos and tragedy of world politics are dynamically present in this vexing problem for which there is no easy answer.

THE ALGERIAN DILEMMA

The problem of Algeria is a dramatic example of the dilemma we face in Africa. Because of our admiration and affection for the French people and because of France's vital importance in the Western alliance, we have failed to give adequate political and diplomatic expression to the instinctive sympathy of the American people for the aspirations of the Algerians for freedom and self-government.

This sympathy for Algerian aspirations has risen to the point where it is becoming politically impossible for us to remain on the fence much longer. Even if the newspapers in this country had not made it completely clear that Americans are not content to remain neutral on the side of the French in this Algerian situation, articulate voices among our constituents would have convinced us that our paralytic policy cannot and must not be maintained. At the same time, the developing trend toward another critical vote on Algeria at the U.N. is confronting us with a decision which surely cannot be one in favor of an untenable status quo.

The war in Algeria must be ended. The continuing blood bath resulting from the terrorism and counter-terrorism of guerrilla warfare can only lead to barbarism and the betrayal of all the best and most civilized instincts of those involved. Further devastation and other wasting of resources can only vastly increase the sums needed for Algerian human and material development and slow down further economic progress in France.

But it is not enough to recite the hard facts. What can the United States do to promote a settlement?

First, we need to clarify U.S. policy so that it plainly reflects the historical principles and majority sentiments of our people. Neither France nor the Algerian nationalists should be encouraged to remain in doubt about our policy, for such doubts could promote intransigence, and thus prolong the terrible conflict.

The prime ingredients of our national attitude toward the Algerian conflict are friendship for France on the one hand and the desire to see Algerians given their freedom on the other. And do not believe for a minute that these feelings are mutually exclusive.

It is important to note in passing that the words "freedom" and "independence" are not necessarily synonymous. The distinction between these two words is illustrated in our fine and cherished relationship with Puerto Rico. The Puerto Ricans have freely chosen their present Commonwealth status, which is just short of independence from the United States and equally distant from integration with this country through statehood. The overwhelming majority of Puerto Ricans support the present arrangement, but that same majority could have independence for the asking at any time. A comparable approach to the Algerian problem would certainly be consistent with our friendship for France.

President de Gaulle has tried to give just such a free vote to the Algerian people. The fact is, however, that no one will be satisfied with results of such a vote while the people are exposed to the pressures of an all-pervading atmosphere of terrorism and warfare.

I believe our policy must favor freedom of expression for the Algerian people. This cannot be achieved while the conflict continues. And the war will not be ended if the friends of France and Algeria support the most extreme positions advanced by either side. Almost certainly, it can only cease through agreement between the contestants, and such an agreement surely must be reached through negotiations.

We have quite rightly favored mediation efforts by Tunisia and Morocco, but, for a variety of reasons, these have not as yet borne fruit. The time has perhaps arrived for us to invite France to avail itself of the good offices of the United States if there is anything that this country can do to hasten the end of the Algerian conflict.

I have said "perhaps arrived" because I believe that President de Gaulle, the authentic voice of France, can without interference bring about a resolution of the problem if he succeeds in gaining the cooperation of moderate Algerian nationalists, and I do not exclude Mr. Ferhat Abbas from that category. The creation of the French Community is clear evidence that President de Gaulle has the political brilliance, flexibility, and wisdom to find the answer to the need for a new but close French-Algerian relationship. The burning question, to my mind, is one of time.

Finally, I believe that President Eisenhower, in his talks with President de Gaulle, can do much to promote an Algerian settlement by frankly representing the true feelings of the American people, and by setting the problem in the context of inclusive French-American relations.

I digress from these prepared remarks to say that one of the reasons why I made my statement tonight is because the President of the United States is now in Paris. He will be and is now visiting and talking with the great French leader, President de Gaulle. I am confident that these two leaders of western democracies can by working together do much to resolve the very serious situation in Algeria, a situation which presses hard upon the American conscience, and which is a political problem indeed, even in this country, in terms of our votes in the United Nations and our overall foreign policy.

It is not my desire in any way to cause difficulty or embarrassment to these two leaders of western democratic nations. It is my desire to express the hope that encouragement will be given to President de Gaulle to forward his program of freedom and autonomy for Algeria, and that the President of France may be assured of the deep and abiding interest of the American people, through our President, in a just and equitable solution of this crucial and heartbreaking problem involving the violence and warfare in Algeria, which has already existed all too long.

The alliance between our countries is too old and valuable to be diminished by any reluctance to face facts when we so clearly need each other's help as we confront major problems vital to the strength and well-being of the entire free world.

Mr. President, I want to say as emphatically as I can, that this Nation cannot afford to sit on the fence any longer. Our Government must respond to the challenges of emergent Africa with speed, imagination, and sensitivity. We must have a new sense of urgency.

But neither the Congress nor the administration can do what needs to be done without the support of the American people. And the people will not support a new initiative toward Africa until they are better, much better informed, than they are now. Solid public understanding is the foundation for sound public policy.

The time has come for the mass mediums of communication throughout the length and breadth of this land to proclaim the true Africa story. Not the story of big game safaris and strange tribal customs, but the story of an Africa reaching out for freedom and self-respect.

Our reporters and commentators should portray an Africa at the very center of the world struggle between democracy and communism. Africa is crucial in this struggle precisely because she is neutral and politically unalined.

Our schools and colleges should give Africa the attention she deserves by virtue of her role in the present world drama. The Soviet Union is and has been giving Africa a great deal of attention in her educational system and political indoctrination program. Mr. Khrushchev knows that Africa, like India, is in a pivotal position in the coming decades and he is leaving little to chance.

Today it is not too late, but tomorrow it may be. We are the natural allies of the forces of freedom in Africa. If we let them down the cause of genuine freedom in Africa may fail. If the cause of freedom in Africa fails the cause of freedom in the world may fail. The stakes are high. The challenge is great. Will our response be adequate to the challenge? I hope and pray that it will be.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

MANDATORY CONTROLS ON RESIDUAL OIL IMPORTS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, yesterday was the 5-month anniversary of mandatory controls on residual oil imports. Because this program touched off vehement protests on the part of spokesmen for areas into which large volumes of foreign residual oil have been flowing, I feel that it would be in the interest of all concerned—including those executive department authorities responsible for the administration of the program—to review its genealogy and to study the results of this short period of its life.

The mandatory control order is an offspring of a study made by the President's Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy in 1954. But the need for the creation of a defense against enervation of America's domestic fuels industries was actually germinated by avaricious importers more than a decade ago.

The first significant evidence of the foreign invasion of east coast industrial fuel markets dates back to 1946, when some 44 million barrels of residual oil flowed onto our shores. Thereafter great gushers of alien fuel began entering the country. These market seizures took place in a period when American industry was converting to peacetime status and when all available resources were enlisted to hurry recovery in lands devastated by the most destructive war machines and explosives that the world had ever known.

The bituminous coal industry produced 534 million tons of coal in 1946, increasing this output to an alltime high of 631 million tons in 1947. Residual oil imports first moved cautiously, then struck hard in 1949, soaring to 75 million barrels—or 18 million tons of coal in energy equivalent. Meanwhile demand for bituminous coal was beginning to subside. In the next 2 years, output declined by 193 million tons to a level of 438 million tons. It was during this period that the real danger of residual oil imports to the Nation's economy and security became apparent. As a resident of the Nation's foremost coal producing region, I was in a position to observe personally the impact of a foreign product on American industry and American labor. I was a member of the West Virginia State Legislature, which of course was helpless to take effective action because this problem—according to the wise instructions of the Founding Fathers of this country, as stated in the Constitution—had to be resolved by the Congress of the United States.

Many shipments of coal from the northern and southern fields of West Virginia into New York and New England were abruptly halted. Coal produced by American miners was no longer wanted because international entrepreneurs offered energy at cheaper rates. Mines began to halt operations, and whistles that call men to work suddenly became silent. Railroaders whose jobs depend upon coal traffic swelled the list of unemployed in West Virginia. Businesses allied with the coal and railroad industries found themselves without orders, and the slump hit hard throughout local mining and railroad communities.

Hardship conditions were felt in many sections of West Virginia in 1949. There was no doubt as to one important factor responsible for the recession. Imported residual oil. West Virginia and other coal-producing States in the Appalachians were victims of an irrational foreign trade program. We assumed that this condition was only temporary, that it would be rectified once the Federal Government realized the harmful effects of excessive oil imports.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will my colleague from West Virginia yield to me?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I am delighted to yield to my colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I compliment my colleague for the manner in which he has presided over this Chamber for most of the day, I believe.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. For 7 hours and 15 minutes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. While he was engaged in that activity I was in the old Supreme Court chamber, where we had certain matters under consideration.

I think it is important to point out that there are those—perhaps certain Members of this body—who already have indicated that prices of oil products have increased in this country since the restriction on foreign imports began. To the contrary, the price of petroleum has decreased, rather than increased, since import controls were established in 1957. At that time the average price of crude oil was $3.16 a barrel. Only yesterday, I was advised that the price per barrel was down to $3.04. Furthermore, the average price of the four principal petroleum products at the time import controls were established was $4.22 a barrel, while today the average price of such products is $3.82. These figures certainly refute any claim that controls have induced higher prices for crude oil and petroleum items in general.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. For the record, both the House and Senate were alerted to the perils of the prevailing trade policy. Hearings by committees of these legislative bodies produced unimpeachable evidence of inequitable usurpation of coal's markets by foreign oil. Witnesses from various areas of the country appeared voluntarily in Washington in support of legislation to place a quota limitation on residual oil imports. The list of witnesses included not only coal operators and miners, but also representatives of railroads and railroad unions, independent oil producers and refineries, and a variety of other spokesmen for American industry and labor.

From time to time, I have had reason to refer to the reports and recommendations of the subcommittees which conducted those hearings 9 years ago. Chairman of the Senate group was the late Matthew M. Neely. The passing of years has not in any way refuted the conclusions of that subcommittee; it is only to be regretted that ultimate action on the part of the U.S. Government was so long in coming.

One of the witnesses before the Neely subcommittee 9 years ago was Mr. R. M. Davis, of Morgantown, to whom many colleagues paid a rich and deserved tribute last month.

If figures and tables were updated, the 1950 testimony of Mr. Davis could be presented today without fear of contradiction. None of the troubles which he enumerated as directly attributable to an unrealistic oil import policy has disappeared with the passing of years. Rather, each of the problems has been intensified.

Mr. Davis presented statistics to give the Senators a comprehensive picture of the economic losses sustained by coal companies, coal miners, and entire communities subjected to the impact of too much foreign oil. He showed how the interest of the coal operators, the miners, related businesses, Government, and the railroads are interwoven in difficulties that come in with ships carrying fuel to take over American markets. I feel that the following paragraph from the Davis testimony is so pertinent to the matter that it needs repeating today:

> It should be pointed out also that the public school system, including the colleges and the State university, is vitally affected by employment in the coal mines. The number of pupils capable of going to school will be directly affected by the prosperity or lack of it among the miners. The ability of the State and local governments to support the school system depends in part upon the taxes which are collected from mine property and from the miners in the form of the consumers' sales and other taxes. Also the religious and civic life in every community in the State is closely tied up with the prosperity of the people. The financial contribution of the miner and his family to the church and to other local institutions is directly affected by the competitive position of coal with foreign fuel oil.

These unfortunate consequences of an open door policy on oil imports are even more pronounced today than they were 108 months and 1,298 million barrels ago.

Yes, Mr. President, in the 9 years that have elapsed since those hearings, importing companies shipped 1,298 million barrels of residual oil from foreign refineries to U.S. docks. In energy value, these imports were equivalent to more than 310 million tons of bituminous coal—or greater than the total output of West Virginia's mines for any 2 years of that period. Under the circumstances, the White House could not possibly have neglected to include residual oil in the mandatory controls that went into effect last April 1. On reviewing these data, one can only wonder why similar action was not taken long ago.

Certainly the Neely subcommittee was convinced without a doubt that Government action was needed to prevent the wholesale destruction of the domestic oil and coal markets by an ever-increasing sea of imports. This paragraph from the subcommittee's conclusions indicates an attitude on the part of oil importers that prevailed from the start and, in effect, eventually forced the White House to adopt the mandatory controls:

> If there were not a history of continued procrastination by the importers, the committee might be impressed far more than it is by the possibilities for success of a voluntary import-limitation program, subject to such Government supervision as would be necessary to protect the public interest and to insure the faithful accomplishment of the objective.

The subcommittee unanimously recommended that Congress act to hold down oil imports. Emphasizing the State Department's disinclination to provide protection for domestic producers against foreign competition, the subcommittee explained:

> It is perhaps inevitable and certainly understandable that those preoccupied with urgent problems of global concern should be somewhat insensitive to protests of domestic economic dislocation. Fortunately, such lack of vision is not characteristic of legislative representatives entrusted by the Constitution with responsibility for the welfare of the people of the United States.

The late Senator Robert A. Taft, a member of the subcommittee, added these views in a supplemental statement:

> The importation of residual oil is a direct damage to the coal industry. It is produced abroad as a byproduct. Apparently the demand in Europe and elsewhere throughout the world for this byproduct is not sufficient to use up all of the residual oil resulting from foreign processing. Being a byproduct, it is very difficult to determine the cost, and those who produce it are tempted to sell it for any price obtainable in order to get rid of it. This imposes a great handicap on the coal industry and is responsible for the closing of many mines.

When I became a Member of the House of Representatives in 1953, I pledged myself to utilize every resource at hand to persuade Congress and the White House of the need for correcting a situation in which American labor was being shunted aside in order that international oil shippers might retain free access to our fuel markets. In the intervening years, I took the floor of the House on a number of occasions during each session of Congress to warn also of the inherent danger in a policy that does not safeguard a vital American industry against the ravages of uncontrolled foreign competition.

Although I was not then and am not now of the opinion that anything short of a quota limitation set by Congress will ever satisfactorily solve the oil import problem, I felt that recommendations of the Presidential Advisory Committee on February 26, 1955, constituted a substantial gain in the crusade toward a satisfactory adjustment of import levels. That report, after emphasizing the need for an expanding domestic oil industry, stated that other energy industries—particularly coal—must also maintain a level of operation which, in the words of the Committee, "will make possible rapid expansion in output should that become necessary." The report then followed with this recommendation:

> The Committee believes that if the imports of crude and residual oils should exceed significantly the respective proportions that these imports of oils bore to the production of domestic crude oil in 1954, the domestic fuels situation could be so impaired as to endanger the orderly industrial growth which assures the military and civilian supplies and reserves that are necessary to the national defense. There would be an inadequate incentive for exploration and the discovery of new sources of supply.
> In view of the foregoing, the Committee concludes that in the interest of national defense imports should be kept in the balance recommended above. It is highly desirable that this be done by voluntary, individual action of those who are importing or those who become importers of crude or residual oil. The Committee believes that every effort should be made and will be made to avoid the necessity of governmental intervention.
> The Committee recommends, however, that if in the future the imports of crude oil and residual fuel oils exceed significantly the respective proportions that such imported oils bore to domestic production of crude oil in 1954, appropriate action should be taken.
> The Committee recommends further that the desirable proportionate relationships between imports and domestic production be reviewed from time to time in the light of industrial expansion and changing economic and national defense requirements.
> In arriving at these conclusions and recommendations, the Committee has taken into consideration the importance to the economies of friendly countries of their oil exports to the United States as well as the importance to the United States of the accessibility of foreign oil supplies both in peace and war.

To provide implementation for the recommendations of the Presidential Committee, the Senate attached the so-called national defense amendment to the bill extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. This provision was considered an ironclad assurance that oil shippers would voluntarily respect the recommended import levels. In actual practice, however, the volunteer program was no more effective in staying the tides of imported oil than if floodwalls were constructed of only the paper on which this instrumentality of the Senate and the executive department was written. In 1956 residual oil imports went to almost 163 million barrels, and a year later a new record high of 173 million barrels was reached. It was now obvious that the volunteer oil import program had failed.

Domestic oil and coal waited from some action that would at last carry out the intent of Congress and the White House directive. As I have stated previously, the cutbacks recorded in the Presidential advisory study were not as drastic as we had hoped. We recognized that even precise enforcement would not regain for coal the markets that had been overrun by international oil, nor would thousands of unemployed miners be given an opportunity to return to work under this mandate. Having suffered through months and years of economic distress attributable to an irrational foreign trade policy, our coal people accepted the voluntary control program only as a guarantee against further encroachment by alien oil.

To be sure, arrogant international oil companies ignored the limits set by the Presidential committee and endorsed by Congress. Finally the White House—on March 10, 1959—placed mandatory controls on imported crude and products, including residual oil. This accomplishment did not come easy. My colleague from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] and I, accompanied by our State's House delegation, visited many Cabinet offices, during the early part of this year, for the purpose of impressing upon officials the very urgent need to include residual oil in the mandatory controls program. The President's announcement was therefore particularly welcome to us; our enthusiasm was somewhat dimmed, however, by criticism of the program—particularly from New England spokesmen. It is my intense conviction that whatever steps have been and will be taken to safeguard the coal industry against the eroding forces of excessive imports will react to the very definite advantage of New England and other regions in close proximity to the Atlantic seaboard. For this reason, I direct my remarks here today to those statements of dismay at the official action to check the tidal waves of foreign oil that have been sweeping into America's east coast markets.

After the import controls on residual went into effect, there was a chorus of protest which made it appear that disaster was imminent. The criticism, as I recall, was primarily to the effect that prices would rise, and there would be scarcities of residual.

What has happened? The controls went into effect on April 1. Today, the price of residual oil is where it was when the quotas were imposed. Keep in mind that imports were cut back to 1957 levels when a veritable floodtide of residual came into the country, the equivalent of more than 40 million tons of coal. Coal got very little out of the residual order, only that its displacement would not be accelerated. This assurance presupposes that the order will continue in effect and will be effectively enforced.

The catastrophe did not happen. Instead, residual prices are near the lowest levels in history. They even declined for a time after the order went into effect April 1. There is more than enough oil to go around. It continues to be in surplus.

Furthermore, it should be understood that reliance upon foreign sources of supply is uncertain and dangerous in these perilous times. I would like to emphasize, as I have done many times previously, that coal's price stability and abundance are the best assurances which New England and other areas of the country have that they can buy fuel at reasonable prices. Let me point out the tremendous surge in residual oil prices after the Suez crisis as an indication that New England can by no means be certain that residual will continue to be cheap in price or, if a crisis comes, available at any price.

The effectiveness of the mandatory oil import program is of vital interest to all America. One need not be a military or logistics expert to recognize the peril of placing reliance upon a source of energy that must be transported over open sea lanes. I ask the indulgence of the Senate as I recall events of the past that emphasize the danger of neglecting America's domestic fuel industries.

The story of coal's contributions to America's defense efforts actually began to unfold almost 2 centuries ago when this unique fuel was extracted from a mine in Henrico County, Va., sent down the Pamonkey River, and moved to a Chesapeake Bay port for overland transportation to munitions manufactories in Lancaster and Philadelphia.

With the passing of time, coal's role in the development of military equipment and weapons became more and more important. In the dark days of World War I, Lloyd George offered this testimony:

> In peace and in war, King Coal is the paramount lord of industry. It enters into every article of consumption and utility.

Winston Churchill's notable quotations include this observation made on October 31, 1942:

> War is made with steel and steel is made from coal. * * * Coal is the foundation and, to a very large extent, the measure of our whole war effort.

Because a ton of coal goes into the production of every ton of steel, this fuel has a vital role in the manufacture of ships, tanks, aircraft, bombs, rifles, and missiles. Coal is used to make smokeless powder, TNT, and a host of chemicals.

In an emergency, when great volumes of oil must be diverted from civilian use, coal is always expected to fill the gap. Residents of New England particularly should remember how coal came to the rescue in the early days of World War II. Who can forget the photographs of tanker sinkings within eyesight and camera range of Virginia Beach, Miami Beach, and other coastal cities? Germany had only 60 submarines at the beginning of World War II, yet she was able to sever water traffic between our own ports on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic seaboard.

Newspapers of February 8, 1942, featured a dispatch from Washington warning oil consumers that shortages could be expected to become progressively serious in the days ahead. Many buildings were forced to close during the cold winter days that followed, but the worst was yet to come. On May 27 the Government warned New England not to expect oil for homes or factories, advising conversion to coal without delay wherever possible. In the months that followed, Petroleum Coordinator Harold L. Ickes time and again advised that an even more serious situation was certain to develop during the winter months of 1942–43 unless arrangements were made to burn coal. On January 4, 1953, a hospital for children at Rockaway, N.Y., was ordered closed because of the fuel oil shortage. Other casualties in January and February included the shutdown of eight Rhode Island textile mills, the closing of schools, and hardship in a variety of manufacturing plants and office buildings.

New Englanders would also be well-advised to recall this opening paragraph of page 1 of the Boston Post for March 26, 1943:

> Claims from Washington that the public health would not suffer as a result of the fuel oil shortage during the past winter were ridiculed last night by health experts in Boston and surrounding cities and towns.

I remind the Congress that Russia now has a fleet of approximately 400 submarines—many of them long-range—that would be put into action in the event of a war outbreak. To depend upon shipments from the far-off Middle East and from the refineries of South America in the face of a submarine pack of this size would be sheer folly.

But let us, for the moment, return to this question of foreign goods and low prices. There is no contesting the fact that residual oil can be shipped into the markets of this country at prices that undersell coal. This was the stratagem that enabled importers to seize such a large part of coal's traditional markets for 10 years and more. The accepted laws of economics have continually been disregarded in setting the sales price of foreign residual oil. In 1948 the charge at the port of entry was $2.97 a barrel. This figure mysteriously dropped to $1.89 the following year, and from that time it has zigzagged up and down to the complete confusion of rule-of-thumb calculations and in defiance of the most carefully devised economic theories. In 1956 the price was $2.76. Business slumped generally in 1957, but somehow the importers were able to command $3.10 per barrel for their foreign product. Last year the figure was $2.57 and—lo and behold—despite the vociferous admonitions that followed the White House mandate to control residual oil imports, there was an unaccountable price decline with imported residual oil being offered for sale at dockside in New York at a mere $2 per barrel.

No, Mr. President, it does not appear that any shifting of the import levels need have a direct effect on prices of imported residual oil. But let us assume that those who predicted a price rise following the White House announcement on March 10 of this year had been correct and that consumers in New England had been required to pay a little more for fuel supplies. In the first place, I do not believe that home owners enjoyed any reduction in the cost of electricity when imported residual oil underwent one of its periodic flip-flops. Nor have I noted a similar decline in prices of finished goods in New England industrial plants that took advantage of the lower prices offered by oil shippers.

Traditionally, members of the New England delegation actively protest trade policies that place their own industries at a disadvantage with foreign sellers in American marketplaces. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD offers adequate evidence of such protestations through the years. This attitude on the part of office holders representing New England is to be admired. When competition from Europe or Asia creates unemployment in Boston, Bridgeport, Portland, or Nashua, it is incumbent upon elected representatives of those areas to exhaust every effort in an attempt to eliminate the injustices that tolerate such conditions.

I am happy to be associated with those of my colleagues who insist upon protection of domestic industry from commodities manufactured in countries where standards of living are low and where labor earns only a small percentage of its counterparts in this country. And I respectfully solicit your understanding of similar economic problems that have been persisting in West Virginia for entirely too long.

Robert Frost wrote:

> Anything I can say about New Hampshire will serve almost as well about Vermont,
> Excepting that they differ in their mountains.
> The Vermont mountains stretch extending straight;
> New Hampshire mountains curl up in a coil.

There may be more identifiable differences between the mountains of West Virginia and those of Vermont and New Hampshire, but there is nothing about the topography of our State that would alter the basic economic principles that prevail in every part of America. If too many hats and too many bicycles produced abroad are shipped into the markets of this country, somebody in New England is going to hurt. If tuna fish caught in foreign waters enter the United States in excessive amounts, there are families in California who may find themselves unable to feed their children with anything but the surplus tuna taken into their own boats. Open the doors to foreign producers of cotton and other agricultural products and there will be a business depression in the South. Bring in more Argentine beef and American cattlemen and packers will suffer. Invite more foreign dairy products and farmers in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan will find it mighty difficult to make a living.

We do not deny that these foreign commodities can be made available at dollar savings to the American consumer. But it is a transaction responsible for bringing unemployment to many Americans. Does anyone believe that it is fair for West Virginia's principal industry to be exposed to the battering of a mounting sea of foreign oil while the bread-and-butter industries of New England—or the Northwest, the Middle West, the Southwest, or the Deep South—enjoy a serene haven of tariff and quota protection?

Do I hear the argument that oil markets must be kept scot free of import impediments in order to promote good will among exporting countries? Even the more credulous among us should disregard these timeworn polemics. Realists should never be swayed by this type of political and diplomatic strategy when the jobs and livelihoods of the people they represent are at stake.

How Venezuelan sensitivity would react to controls on imports is an issue that has been raised since Senator Neely proposed a quota limitation back in the days of the since-deposed Mr. Jimenez. The President's mandatory order finally went into effect 5 months ago, and Venezuela appears to have survived the ordeal.

As for Venezuela, her citizenry certainly should not question a philosophy that would provide a modicum of protection for the American worker against the pernicious economic disease that threatens any industrial civilization which does not take the precaution to examine carefully all imports and reject those in excess. Several years ago, the U.S. Department of Commerce, Office of International Trade, reported that Venezuela imposes "very high duties on products similar to those domestically produced." The analysis continued:

> Before World War II import duties accounted for about 40 percent of all national revenue. Since the war they have declined in relative importance and currently account for only about 20 percent. This proportionate decline was due in part to the growth in protectionism—although the importation of duty-free goods continued, the importation of dutiable goods has tended to be further impeded.
> In addition to import duties, Venezuela imposes numerous other types of trade controls. On the import side, they include import licensing requirements, import quotas, regulations requiring the purchase of specified amounts of local products for each unit imported, import prohibitions, and quarantine laws.

Venezuela's attitude, in which domestic industry is safeguarded against ruinous import competition, is not unique in South America or in most other parts of the world, even though this family plan appears to be foreign to State Department officials who have taken unto themselves the power to liberalize America's trade policies. The State Department is guilty of promulgating the program that subordinates the welfare of industry and labor in the United States to the producing forces of other nations, yet Congress cannot escape culpability for the needless, irresponsible, and unwise surrender of this constitutionally derived authority. Protection of American industry was for many decades considered as sacred and necessary as immigration laws.

Since 1934, when Congress delegated to the President wide authority in the regulation of duties on imported goods, the average rates on dutiable goods have tended sharply downward. In contrast, few other nations have reciprocated. Most foreign countries cling to tariff rates much higher than those prevailing here, and in addition resort to such restrictive measures as import licenses and exchange controls that may be utilized to whatever extent is necessary for the protection of their own industries against foreign competition, including competition of the products of American labor.

Because the productive capacity of leading industrial nations in Europe and Asia was largely laid waste during World War II, a preponderance of America's mass production industries found little difficulty in obtaining market outlets during the first postwar decade. Indeed, the demand persisted at such a high level that a more liberalized trade program was widely acclaimed by those enjoying the profits of overseas selling as the answer to international economic problems. Those of us in West Virginia—where coal, pottery, ceramics, and assorted manufacturing industries were adversely affected by import competition—pleaded for a more perspective appraisal. New England also recognized the danger of speeding crazily down the road to more liberalized trade policies without proper braking equipment in the form of sensible tariff and quota laws. The South recognized the danger once Japan's textile plants were rehabilitated. Now, at long last, more and more regions are beginning to feel the need for a more cautious approach to the widening avenues of international trade.

Inasmuch as the list of victims of irrational trade policies is being enlarged, I am confident that the Senate and House will be more receptive to reviewing objectively the entire trade agreements program in the very near future—perhaps at the second session of this Congress. Meanwhile Congress must at least encourage the executive department to continue to take steps to protect domestic industries that are components of the defense structure. I remind my colleagues that the President's mandatory oil import control program was based exclusively on security considerations. Under these circumstances, it would appear extremely shortsighted for any American to demand lifting of these restrictions even if he disregarded completely the destitution that comes to coal and railroad communities with unregulated shipments of residual oil imports.

Little wonder that the President, advised of what was happening to the coal industry through admission of as much residual oil as international shippers chose to dump on our fuel markets, resorted to the mandatory control program.

In 1958 the U.S. bituminous coal industry produced slightly more than 400 million tons. Members of a task force that developed statistical information for the Cabinet Committee on Energy Resources in 1954 came to the conclusion that the national security requires the bituminous coal industry to maintain an annual production level of at least 500 million tons if there is to be sufficient capacity for raising output to meet emergency demands.

It is recognized that many mines have closed since foreign residual oil began its lethal sweep into the Atlantic seaboard. I wonder if everyone is aware of what happens to a coal mine when it is closed for any length of time. Unless pumps are kept in constant operation, under ordinary conditions most mines will fill up with water. Then erosion begins to take place. When a flooded mine is to be reopened, the first step is to send in pumps to undertake the dewatering process. With the most modern pumping equipment, many weeks may be required to complete the job. Even then, the mine is far from being ready to go back into operation. Impounded water creates bad roof conditions; when ventilation is restored as the water is pumped out, air that comes in contact with the roof causes much of it to disintegrate. The bad roof must be taken down and bad timbering must be replaced. Only after these operations are completed and the roof has been made safe is it possible to begin such necessary work as repairing or reinstalling track, and rewiring. Finally, at long last, the actual mining equipment is brought in. In all, a full year may be required to begin taking the coal out of a mine that has been closed for any length of time.

The railroad industry, of course, suffers a collateral loss in carrying capacity. The junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] has frequently brought to public attention the prevailing economic difficulties of many American railroads. His most recent contribution was published in This Week magazine on July 26. He is justifiably concerned with the very serious problems that confront this vital transportation network. Railroads are not economically capable of maintaining rolling stock in operating condition when traffic is down. If coal had filled one half of the orders served by foreign residual oil in east coast markets in 1958, the tonnage to be moved would fill more than 400,000 railroad hoppers. The implications are obvious. The railroads would gain important revenues, more operating and maintenance crews would be required, and thousands of additional hoppers would be kept in serviceable condition. Currently, too many coal-carrying cars are rusting away on sidings. In an emergency, a car shortage would be inevitable.

The mandatory controls program has helped to alleviate the deficit of coal cars. To lift restrictions on residual oil imports would constitute a further security threat from the standpoint of the railroad industry as well as in relation to the coal industry.

Mr. President, the general public needs to be apprised of the security requirements which necessitated the imposition of mandatory controls on residual oil. I feel that periodic reviews of the program, its results, and its ramifications will serve the interests of the entire Nation. My remarks on this subject are intended to provide Congress with a running account of the results of the mandatory control program, and to emphasize the need for rigid enforcement and continuation of the control program. I have presented the history of imported residual oil prices which bob curiously in their own capricious manner, independent of business factors which normally determine market value. Ample supplies of this fuel are still available, and will continue to be unless international oil shippers find it to their advantage to shut off valves at their cornucopian sources. Although the free world is consuming approximately 16 million barrels of oil a day, another 5 million barrels could be produced every 24 hours at negligible expense.

The only legitimate reason for a residual oil shortage on the Atlantic seaboard in the foreseeable future would be an unexpected political development in Venezuela, whose capital city was shaken by 9 hours of rioting last month. Past experiences in South America and the Middle East have lent emphasis to the theory that foreign sources of fuel supply should never be permitted to supplant domestic production.

When all these factors are carefully studied, there should be no more attacks on the mandatory control program. Instead, this program should receive the welcome endorsement of areas in which international oil shippers have found convenient customers of a fuel whose supply will remain in serious doubt during eras of unsteady world peace and intranational strife. I am also hopeful that, in the future, a more sympathetic understanding of coal regions' economic difficulties will be in evidence among our people throughout the country. I think that the position of the coal industry with respect to oil imports is akin to that of the woolen industry when Mayor John B. Hynes, of Boston warned—and his statement was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 28, 1954—that import competition would result in less employment and smaller payrolls at home, and that it would have, in his own words, "an adverse effect upon the whole New England community."

Residual oil imports have had an adverse effect upon the whole community of West Virginia and other coal-producing States. The mandatory control program has arrested the impact, and I respectfully appeal to all Senators to stand firm in insisting that the specified levels continue to be respected as a precaution against further economic debilitation and in defense of the security of our country.

R. 213) entitled "An act to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 218 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2906) entitled "An act to extend the period for filing claims for credit or refund of overpayments of income taxes arising as a result of renegotiation of Government contracts."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) entitled "An act to amend title 46, United States Code, section 601, to clarify types of arrestment prohibited with respect to wages of U.S. seamen."

By unanimous consent further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1960

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the further consideration of the veto of the President of the United States on the bill (H.R. 7509) making appropriations for civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the Tennessee Valley Authority, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes.

The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this question has been thoroughly debated repeatedly in both Houses. It has been widely discussed in the press, especially in the last few days.

I also inserted in the RECORD for Monday a complete analysis of the effect of the veto, the question raised by the veto is a matter of general knowledge.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration, pass the bill H.R. 7509, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Under the Constitution, this vote must be determined by the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 274, nays 138, answered "present" 1, not voting 22, as follows:

Anfuso	Hall	Powell
Baumhart	Jones, Mo.	St. George
Bolton	Lesinski	Sikes
Canfield	McDonough	Van Pelt
Cooley	Machrowicz	Westland
Derwinski	Mason
Ford	O'Brien, N.Y.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Machrowicz and Mr. O'Brien of New York for, with Mr. Herlong against.

Mr. Jones of Missouri and Mr. Poage for, with Mr. Ford against.

Mr. Sikes and Mr. Anfuso for, with Mr. Derwinski against.

Mr. Cooley and Mr. Lesinski for, with Mr. Van Pelt against.

Mr. Hall and Mr. Powell for, with Mr. Westland against.

Mr. Baumhart and Mr. Gray for, with Mrs. Bolton against.

Until further notice:

Mr. Andrews with Mr. Mason.

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, I have a live pair with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'BRIEN] who if present would have voted "yea." I voted "nay." I therefore withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. HARRISON changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

Messrs. CHENOWETH, FENTON, and CURTIN changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, may we not have the vote announced first?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that there can be a recapitulation before or after the vote. Therefore, we will have a recapitulation.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALLECK. Upon request, will not the Speaker announce the vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has discretion in this matter.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, the Clerk will call the names of those voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALLECK. Under the rules of the House, in view of the fact that the vote has not been announced, may anyone vote even though he was not here when the roll was called?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman repeat his inquiry?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to ascertain is simply this: In view of the fact that the Speaker has elected not to announce the vote, does that mean, as this recapitulation progresses, if any Member who was not here presents himself now in the Chamber, will he be permitted to vote?

The SPEAKER. If he qualifies; that is, he was in the hall listening and did not hear his name called. Otherwise, he could not.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for an announcement of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ordered a recapitulation. The Clerk will call the names of those voting in the affirmative.

The Clerk called the names of those voting "yea."

The SPEAKER. Are there any corrections in the names of those voting in the affirmative?

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if my name was read in the affirmative? I understood it to be, and if it was, it is incorrect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded as voting in the negative, not the affirmative.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of how the gentleman is recorded. It is a question of whether the gentleman was present, listening, and was recorded wrongly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear my name and should be recorded "yea."

The SPEAKER. All these things can be taken care of after we complete the recapitulation.

Are there any corrections to be made in the names of those called as voting in the affirmative? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will call the names of those voting in the negative.

The Clerk called the names of the Members voting in the negative.

The SPEAKER. Are there any corrections in the names of those who voted "nay"? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

On this vote the "yeas" are 274, the "nays" are 138, 1 present. Two-thirds having failed to vote in the affirmative, the bill is not passed.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the veto of the President was sustained and the bill was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The message and the bill are referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk will notify the Senate of the action of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has referred it to the committee.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT'S VETO OF THE PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAMPLER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, the President's veto of the public works appropriation bill for fiscal 1960 is not only patently unwise, it makes a mockery of the administration's shrill demands for fiscal responsibility as being in the best interests of the country. Surely a measure which provides, in large part, for the planning and construction of such highly desirable domestic contributions to the state of this Nation's natural resources as flood control projects, improvements of our harbors and rivers and resources reclamation should not be the subject of whimsical Presidential veto. Should it, as has been the case with the public works money bill for 1960, I cannot understand how reasonable men can honestly term as being in the best interests of the country an administration turndown of legislation designed to aid, on a humanitarian basis, American flood victims and to recapture losses in our natural resources.

In my own State of Indiana, there has been an almost unbelievable rate of waste, loss of life, and devastation resulting from incessant flooding of the Wabash River. Floodwaters from the creeks and rivers of the upper Wabash River in the northern section of the State pour down into the lower reaches of the Wabash, in the Sixth District, not once, but several times a year. Life and property losses over the years have been staggering. More than $64 million worth of agricultural production and property has been washed out of the potentially productive Wabash Valley since 1913; in February 1959, alone, more than $10 million in damage was caused by the rampaging Wabash River.

I fail to see how any Member of this body who has any concern for the welfare of the people of our districts, States, and this Nation, as I am sure we all do, can fail to vote to override the President's veto of this absolutely vital legislation; particularly any Member of Congress from the consistently flood-stricken State of Indiana.

The President's veto message makes numerous references to "unbudgeted projects," "overspending," the necessity for sound fiscal policies, and states the President's belief that the "American people look to the Government to see that their tax money is spent only on necessary projects and according to a priority as to urgency that does not weaken our financial structure nor add to the tremendous debt burden that posterity will have to pay."

Mr. Speaker, the President's stated concern for the debt burden which will have to be carried by posterity can only be construed as meaningless verbiage when one considers that the fiscal 1960 money bill for public works contains only $30 million more than requested by the Administration, an infinitesimal quantity when compared with the overall multibillion dollar 1960 budget; and when one considers the President's demands for hundreds of millions of dollars to finance, in many instances, similar public works construction in countries other than the United States; and when one considers that, to date, the Congress has pared down the President's 1960 budget requests by almost $400 million.

I say, let us override this veto and allow some of the taxpayers' money to be spent for the good of the taxpayer.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, on August 26, 1959, the President vetoed the public works appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1960 which contained funds to carry on the civil functions administered by the Department of the Army, certain agencies of the Department of the Interior, and the Tennessee Valley Authority. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Rivers and Harbors of the Committee on Public Works, I, of course, am vitally interested in the flood control, navigation, and beach erosion projects, funds for which are in the appropriation bill because of the fact that these projects were originally authorized by the Committee on Public Works.

I believe that the veto of the entire program is a grave error on the part of the President and is a shining example of his indifference to water resource development.

It will be recalled that in 1956 and again in 1958 he vetoed the omnibus river and harbor and flood control bill, title I of which was the work of the subcommittee of which I am chairman, and title II of which is the work of the Subcommittee on Flood Control of which the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, the Honorable CLIFFORD DAVIS, is chairman. I have had long and sad experience therefore with the President's attitude toward water resource development. This attitude even extends to problems of water pollution, and on this subject the President, in his budget message, reduced the amount contemplated by Congress for appropriation and expressed his desire to eliminate the Federal grant system entirely at a future date.

Returning to the most recent veto, I would like to invite attention to the fact that the total appropriation of $1,206 million is only $50 million in excess of the President's budget. This addition is the amount agreed to in conference after the other body had added a total of approximately $80 million. I feel that the House is to be commended for having reached a compromise which is only 4 percent in excess of the budgeted figure. This is an amount which is well within the margin of error in the cost estimates themselves.

The President gives as his principal reason for the veto the fact that the ultimate cost of these projects will be more than $800 million. He fails to point out, however, that by the time these unbudgeted projects reach their peak of construction, many of those now underway will be completed. The impression is left that some future budget will be increased by $800 million which is, of course, ridiculous since this amount would be spread over many years.

I would also like to point out that the President does not criticize the merits of the 67 projects. In fact he states that the unbudgeted projects in the bill will, at the proper time, make an important contribution to the economic development of the areas in which they are to be built and to the Nation as a whole. The Appropriations Committees gave long and careful consideration to the testimony presented and selected only those economically justified, worthwhile projects which, in its opinion, should go ahead at this time. These projects are only a small fraction of the backlog of projects in the field of flood control, navigation, and reclamation.

I urge every Member of this body, whether he has a project in the bill or not, to vote to override the veto for the good of the country as a whole.

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, it was most regrettable that the President saw fit to veto the public works appropriation bill. It will be noted that he did not question the merit of the 67 projects which had been added to the ones which he had originally recommended. On the contrary, he based his veto essentially on the grounds that the timing was bad.

Some opponents of reclamation, in their news releases, have suggested that there were phony or pork-barrel projects mixed into the public works bill, and that it was therefore necessary to first weed them out. I, personally, challenge the truth of this proposition. I have placed myself in touch with the officials of the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of the Interior, and with the Army Corps of Engineers. I have been assured by those who did the planning on these projects that all 67 of them have a favorable cost-benefit ratio, and that from an engineering and economic point of view, they are meritorious.

Why, then, was the bill vetoed? The reason given is that it was for budgetary considerations. In other words, this is the year for no new starts. Regardless of the need, there shall be no new starts. We cannot afford them.

This shortsighted policy was first conceived at a time when it was thought that the 86th Congress might embark on a wild and uncontrolled orgy of extravagance. The actual record, however, shows how wrong this hypothesis turned out to be. Yet the misconceived policy of no new starts still lingers on. The evidence is strong that we shall end this session with an impressive surplus. No person interested in balancing the budget can honestly say that the $30 million which the public works appropriation bill adds to our budget for fiscal 1960 will throw it out of balance.

The administration has therefore shown an inflexibility and unwillingness to adapt its program to ever-changing realities.

When a private utility company launches a plan to spend many hundreds of millions of dollars of equity funds and borrowed funds for capital expansion to meet the needs of a growing community, we give it the accolade of praise and public approval. We call it a bold and imaginative step forward. We call it good business, and a sound investment in the future, because every dollar spent will bring back rich and ample returns.

But when the United States of America makes a capital investment in its future in the form of dams and reservoirs, flood-control projects, and irrigation works, those who philosophically oppose such measures cry out: We cannot afford them.

Mr. Speaker, if we cannot afford an investment in the sound and economical utilization of our natural resources to create more business and more wealth and more productive capacity, to take care of our exploding population which, within the lifetime of many of you in this room will reach 250 million and more, then what under heaven can we afford?

This money is not in the nature of a gift. It is a loan. It will be repaid, with interest. It is secured, and that security consists in our mountains, our rivers, our fertile prairies, and our almost-unlimited productive capacity. This security is as good as America is good.

In 1915 the U.S. Government undertook to construct in the State of Utah what is known as the Strawberry Reservoir project. As was to be expected, it was resisted by those to whom its immediate cost seemed more important than its ultimate benefits.

Let us look at the record of this humble little project, which cost $3⅓ million.

Forty-four years later we find that it has paid back 80 percent of its initial cost, with interest. In addition, it has made possible the growing of $78½ million worth of crops, which represents 22 times the value of the original investment. Power, municipal water, and recreation associated with the project bring in one-half million dollars per year. Personal incomes directly attributable to this project amount to $18 million per year. Twelve thousand people live on land made livable by this little project, and Federal taxes paid into the Federal Government from income made possible by this project amount to some $4½ million a year, which is more than a million dollars a year in excess of its entire cost. All of this, as a result of a mere $3⅓ million investment—and this is just the beginning.

Mr. Speaker, the Strawberry Reservoir, in 1915, was a new start. I am thankful that that did not deter wise men from seeing its value to the future of this Nation.

In closing, I cannot resist the temptation, half in whimsey, but half in seriousness, to inquire whether President Eisenhower is prepared to ask Premier Khrushchev wheher he, too, is willing to adopt a no-new-starts policy in Russia, so that our country will not be too embarrassed by the difference in the speed at which the two nations are increasing their productivity. Obviously Russia will not slacken its pace, regardless of how well Khrushchev is treated by the State Department, and every year's delay in our own reclamation program will give us that much more cause for regret.

I support the public works appropriation bill of 1959 because it is an investment in the future and the prosperity of America.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, relative to the vote on the President's veto of the public works appropriation bill today, I could not find it in my heart to vote to sustain this veto, and I frankly admit that it afforded me no pleasure.

The bill which the President vetoed provides for less than one-sixtieth of the total budget request for fiscal year 1960, all for urgent flood control projects in almost every State of the Union, irrigation, reclamation, hydroelectric projects and related facilities, deepening of harbors, and so forth.

It is noteworthy that the bill which the President vetoed provided for funds less than 1½ percent above the amount which the President requested, and that when the conference bill was before the House on August 14, only one voice was heard against the bill.

Furthermore, every penny in the bill will be spent right here within the shores of the United States of America.

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, last week, President Eisenhower vetoed the $1.2 billion public works appropriation bill. He gave, as his chief reason for the veto, the fact that funds were included in the bill for 67 new starts which would ultimately cost $800 million.

Thus, it seems clear that the President's objections are centered on the long-range effect the bill would have, financially speaking, rather than on its immediate unbudgeted impact which has been estimated at only $50 million.

I think it important for all of us to be aware of the nature of the problems we will face, as a Nation, as our population explodes from 171 million today to 195 million in 1965, 248 million in 1980, and a projected 370 million by the year 2010. Foremost among those problems is certain to be that of providing an adequate supply of water for both domestic and industrial purposes.

Interrelated to the certain expanding demand for water, will also be the need for flood control, power, navigation, outdoor recreational facilities, and other such projects as are included in the vetoed bill. Any failure in meeting those demands and needs on schedule would surely result in serious disruptions in our economic growth.

We must not, however, in responding to the urgency of this problem at the Federal level, ignore the necessity for what the President, in his veto message, has called the "orderly development of America's water resources within the Nation's fiscal ability." The key phrase is: "within the Nation's fiscal ability."

Now, of course, as our population grows so will the receipts by the Federal Treasury, and so will such other generally accepted yardsticks of national capabilities as, for instance, the gross national product. Obviously, we can hope to do more in another decade than we could in the next several years.

Who, then, is going to judge the size of the effort America can make now in this field—the President, or the Congress? Some news sources are referring to the vetoed bill as a "pork barrel" bill. This is inaccurate. Traditionally, perhaps, public works bills—authorizations and appropriations—have been "pork barrel" measures, in the sense that there would be included therein projects which were either economically unjustified or engineeringly unsound. I do not understand that to be the case here.

Nevertheless, it can be assumed that, as in any congressional measure of this sort, political considerations, personal influence, geographical "logrolling" and the like, all played a part in the fashioning of the vetoed omnibus bill. Particularly, this assumption would seem to apply to the so-called new starts. I do not say this critically, and I hope it can be regarded as an objective statement of what we should all be willing to recognize as a legislative failing.

We in Congress are normally apt to look at this sort of subject through glasses that are tinted and somewhat distorted, without our even realizing it, by our awareness of the needs of our particular districts. On the other hand, the President who, with the Vice President, is the only Federal official elected by all the people, can and must make his determinations here on the basis of what he sees through the national glasses. President Eisenhower above all others, since he is not eligible for reelection, can safely be considered free of all political bias in deciding, as he has done, that the budget-approved projects included in the vetoed bill—which total an all-time high of $1.1 billion, which is three-quarters again as much as the Federal expenditure level along these lines in 1955—is all that America can work on now without going beyond her fiscal ability. He warns, in addition, that just to carry on the projects now under way will ultimately cost $6 billion, and that to attempt now to commence work on other projects may weaken our financial structure and add to the tremendous debt burden our children already carry.

I recognize that the President may be wrong. This is an economic decision. Not even all economists are in agreement as to our national future and capabilities, but, rather than to add to the $1,564 share of the national debt which each of my two small sons now bear, in this instance I cast my lot on the side of the President.

I do so with full awareness of the fact that, if the veto is sustained, I may be helping to cause a delay in the funding of the $1.7 million needed to complete the Endicott-Vestal, N.Y., floodwall project now going on in my district, and the funding of the $40,000 floodwall planning work for Nichols, N.Y., also in my district. But I believe the people of my district will approve the acceptance of such a risk in the national interest.

Finally, if the veto is sustained, as I hope it will be, I am confident that the Congress can and will immediately pass another appropriation bill so that work in progress on the budgeted items around the country can proceed without jeopardy. The Congress should not adjourn until it has so acted.

It should also be pointed out that this situation dramatizes to the fullest extent the need for a constitutional amendment giving the President the power of "item veto" as has been recommended by Presidents of both political parties since Ulysses S. Grant. Early this year I introduced House Joint Resolution 282 which would have that effect, and I deplore the fact that the majority party has not seen fit to permit consideration of this measure.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, it seems incredible that just one vote put a roadblock in front of water resource development today.

The public works bill embraced programs to improve and increase domestic and municipal water supply, provide for pollution abatement, insure water for industrial uses and provide for irrigation and reclamation.

As a result of sustaining the veto of that bill, new starts in areas where development has been long overdue will not be undertaken and some existing projects may be endangered.

The citizens of North Dakota are vitally interested in water development. All segments of the State are united solidly behind a plan to divert water from the Missouri River, insure the water supply for many of the towns and cities in the area, and provide for irrigation in areas where rainfall is not dependable. This plan is known as the Garrison diversion unit—a brochure of this proposed project has been mailed to every Member of Congress.

While the people of my State support the Garrison diversion unit, they also are interested in water development throughout the country. Many groups in North Dakota have been formed to advance and encourage water resource development. These people cooperate with groups in other States to discuss their problems and share ideas in this important field.

The North Dakota American Legion, the North Dakota Bankers Association, the North Dakota Farmers Union, the North Dakota Farm Bureau, the North Dakota Water Users Association, the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District, and many others have taken a genuine interest in water resource development.

Prior to the vote on the public works veto today, I received requests that I vote to override the veto from public-spirited citizens in all walks of life. Telegrams were received from the following: L. C. Mueller, Oakes, N. Dak., president of the North Dakota Water Users Association; Oscar N. Berg, Minot,

N. Dak., executive secretary of the North Dakota Water Users Association; H. W. Lyons, Jamestown, N. Dak., businessman; W. M. Harrington, Minot, N. Dak., mayor; A. R. Weinhandl, Minot, N. Dak., banker; Henry J. Steinberger, Donnybrook, N. Dak., farmer; and A. J. Christopher, Pembina, N. Dak., director of North Dakota Water Users Association.

I was also advised by Mr. Herschel Lashkowitz, mayor of the city of Fargo, N. Dak., that the Fargo city commission had adopted a resolution requesting the Congress to override the veto.

Additional requests to override came from the following Rural Electric Cooperative Associations: Nodak Rural Electric Cooperative, Inc.; Burke-Divide Electric Cooperative; Williams Electric Cooperative, Inc.; Mor Gran Sou Electric Cooperative, Inc.; Sheyenne Valley Electric Cooperative; Mountrail Electric Cooperative, Inc.

Mr. Speaker, despite the stunning defeat administered today to water development throughout the Nation, I believe the people of North Dakota stand squarely behind these programs both in their State and in other States.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I voted to override the President's veto of the public works appropriation bill for 1960—H.R. 7509—because I was truly appalled at the flippancy with which the President disposed of this major appropriation bill. Because the Congress in its judgment dared to differ by about 2½ percent from the Bureau of the Budget's dictate on projects which help the development of the Nation's water resources, the President was persuaded for the 144th time to disapprove a bill passed by both Houses.

Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed and saddened that this House did not reaffirm its passage of H.R. 7509 by overriding the President's ill-advised veto and asserting the power and the prestige of the National Legislature as an equal and coordinate branch of our Federal Government. I am alarmed that Congress by its failure to stand up to the Executive is more and more relegating itself into a subordinate position.

The President has flouted the judgment of sound, conservative members of the Public Works Appropriation Subcommittees in the House and the Senate who, after mature consideration decided that 67 additional projects totaling about $51.5 million are needed in the Nation's overall water resources program.

To provide for these new works the President's budget requests were trimmed over $20 million and an extra $30 million was added. I agree with the judgment of my able and distinguished colleagues, our venerable CLARENCE CANNON, of LOUIS C. RABAUT, MICHAEL KIRWAN, and BEN JENSEN, just to name a few members of the House Subcommittee on Public Works Appropriations that as a dynamic, growing country we cannot afford to stand dead still while our water resources deteriorate or are dissipated.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am worried what the future of St. Paul and South St. Paul, Minn., holds in view of the successful but ruthless and shortsighted administration policy of no new construction starts. This year money is budgeted for the advance planning of a badly needed flood control project of the Mississippi River which runs through St. Paul and South St. Paul. If flood control improvements had been in existence 10 years ago, the affected area would have been spared flood damage of $2,788,000 in 1951 and $4,650,000 in 1952—the sum of which exceeds even the present estimated cost of the project. Some of the important commercial developments involved in this 5,400-acre area include steel fabrication, paint, fertilizer, meat processing, and box manufacturing plants; petroleum, coal, and grain storage facilities; river terminals, steam generating plants; railroad repair shops; stockyards; and an airfield. In addition there are sewage treatment plants for the Twin City area, main lines of nine major railway systems and a complex of Federal and State highways.

But important as this area has been to the commercial and industrial life of the Gateway to the Northwest, its greatest development awaits the flood control improvements which will make it possible to begin a vast and exciting urban renewal program to stimulate the economic growth of our district. I, for one, therefore resent any implication that such a project is useless, or "pork barrel."

Before the planning stage is completed, the people affected by the St. Paul-South St. Paul flood control project will expect the administration to abandon altogether the policy of economic mummification that has too long dangerously hampered the development of the Nation's resources, human and natural, when we alone stand as a bulwark for the free world.

Mr. HARGIS. Mr. Speaker, the only proposed new start on a water resources project in southeast Kansas—a $400,000 allocation for Elk City Dam on the Elk River—got the ax when the public works appropriations bill went to conference. So it cannot be said that I had any ax of my own to grind when I cast what turned out to be a futile vote yesterday in favor of overriding the President's shortsighted, dictatorial, and totally unjustified veto of this bill.

I am unable to muster much sorrow for the few backsliding Democrats who failed to rally to this noblest of causes. But my heart goes out, in deep and sincere sympathy, to the poor Republican Members who fought long and hard to get badly needed water projects in their own districts into this year's bill—and then were compelled, by party pressure and the implacable Eisenhower will, to smash their own handiwork and betray the people they represent.

If this can be construed as another victory for the administration, it is a hollow victory indeed—and a victory won at the expense of legitimate progress in a vital area of the national welfare.

I have always believed that Congressmen who came from areas of water shortage or flooding were the best judges of the needs of that area, and when any such Congressman proved his case to the Public Works Committee, and who had the Engineers' survey accepting his request and showing its need, and the Public Works Committee then refers the project as essential to the Appropriations Committee, and the Appropriations Committee then approves such appropriations; this I had always thought was good evidence that our country's needs were proven. But it seems that one who has probably never seen the area, and knows nothing of the hardship and needs of the people, must be the final judge. The President stopped this progress merely because he says eventual total cost of 67 projects would have been $800 million over an indeterminate period of years, and yet in the next breath he will ask many times this sum for other countries, each year.

It was also my personal conviction that assuring a continuing program of improved domestic water resources was far more important than pouring unlimited funds into our lavish, wasteful, hopelessly mismanaged foreign aid program. This idea of mine remains unchanged, and is shared by a good many of my constituents. I eagerly await the day when it takes hold on so widespread a scale that something will have to be done about it—and I do not believe that day is far off.

Meanwhile, we are faced, presumably, with the necessity of accepting a veto-proof, progress-proof, and extensively watered-down water resources program for fiscal 1960.

There are a great many people in this country who have endured, as have my fellow citizens in southeast Kansas, water shortages that can only be met by Federal reservoir construction, and sudden water surpluses in the form of devestating floods that can only be stopped by federally constructed reservoirs—either too much or too little, but never any equitable balance.

These people are fed to the teeth with delays. The Republican-controlled press is finding it increasingly difficult to sell them on the idea that Ike and the Budget Bureau can do no wrong—and that an idle, undeveloped damsite—authorized for construction that may even get started within their lifetime, if they live to ripe old ages—is a damsite better than no damsite at all. But the papers keep plugging away, and I am sure their tone and attitude will undergo no radical change. Fortunately, their readers are bright enough to see through the thick fog of propaganda—and fed up enough to do something about it, comes next November.

Anyway, the chambers of commerce who flood congressional offices with pleas that the administration's big economy drive be supported at all costs, are now getting their wish. These are the same organizations, of course, who annually send delegations to Washington to plead for an immediate start on water projects affecting the future of their area. I am anxious to see how they reconcile one plea with the other, on the basis of this latest veto..

I can only hope that in the event the other Kansas new starts, on Council Grove and Wilson Reservoirs, get bypassed this year—which seems highly likely at the moment—I will not receive the usual batch of indignant letters, telegrams, and telephone calls asking, "Where were you when all this was going on?"

My answer will be that I was right there on the House floor, doing my best to see that this country gets the water projects it so desperately needs—budgeted or not.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file a report.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT DAY

The SPEAKER. This is District Day. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN].

INDECENT PUBLICATIONS AND GAMBLING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 6123) to amend the law relating to indecent publications and gambling in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 872 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia" approved March 3, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2001), is amended (1) by inserting "(a)" immediately before "Whoever", and (2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(b) Whoever, in the District of Columbia, shall engage in the business of editing, publishing or disseminating any newspaper, pamphlet, magazine, or any printed paper devoted mainly to the publication of scandals, whoring, lechery, assignations, intrigues between men and women, and immoral conduct of persons, or shall knowingly have in his possession for sale or shall keep for sale or distribute or in any way assist in the sale, or shall give away such newspaper, pamphlet, magazine, or printed matter, or whoever shall engage in the showing and exhibition of lewd and lascivious motion pictures, or of lewd and lascivious pictures, or of indecent objects or pictures, or indecent, lewd, or lascivious recordings of any type, shall be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"(c) All moneys, vehicles, furnishings, fixtures, equipment, stock (including without limitation, furniture and fixtures, adaptable to other uses, and equipment and stock for printing, filming, exhibiting, recording, transporting, safekeeping or communication) or other things of value used or to be used in violating subsection (a) or (b) hereof shall be subject to seizure by any officer or member of the Metropolitan Police force or the United States Park Police, or the United States marshal, or any deputy marshal for the District of Columbia and shall, upon seizure, be proceeded against by libel action brought in the municipal court for the District of Columbia in the name of the District of Columbia by the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants and shall, unless good cause be shown to the contrary, be forfeited to the District of Columbia and shall be made available for the use of any agency of the Government of the District of Columbia or otherwise disposed of as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, by order or regulation, provide, except that all such property of a lewd, obscene, lascivious or indecent nature shall, upon order of the court, be destroyed, and any lien thereon shall be deemed not to be a bona fide lien: Provided, That if there be bona fide liens against any other property so forfeited then such property shall be disposed of by public auction. Bona fide liens against the property so forfeited shall, on good cause shown by the lienor, be transferred from the property to the proceeds of the sale of the property. The proceeds of the sale of such property shall be available for the payment of such liens and for all expenses incident to such sale, and the remainder of the proceeds shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

"(d) Any house, building, vessel, garage, shed, booth, shelter, enclosure, room, lot, or other premises to which the public commonly resort or congregate for business or pleasure, where publications, pictures, films, recordings, and other things and devices forbidden by this section are kept, possessed, sold, exhibited, manufactured, bartered, or given away, or to which persons resort for the purpose of observing same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance and may be enjoined as hereinafter provided. Any person who knowingly maintains or assists in maintaining such a place is guilty of maintaining a nuisance.

"(e) Evidence that any of said prohibited acts are frequently committed in any of such places shall be prima facie proof that the proprietor or person having custody or control knowingly permitted the same, and evidence that persons have been convicted of committing any said act in any of such places is admissible to show knowledge on the part of the defendants that this section is being violated in the house or premises. The original papers and judgments, or certified copies thereof in such cases of conviction may be used in evidence in the suit for injunction, and oral evidence is admissible to show that the offense for which said parties were convicted was committed in said house or premises. Evidence of general reputation of said houses or premises shall also be admissible to prove the existence of said nuisance.

"(f) An action to enjoin any nuisance defined in this section may be brought in the name of the District of Columbia by the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants in the municipal court for the District of Columbia against any person conducting or maintaining such nuisance or knowingly permitting such nuisance to be conducted or maintained. The rules of the municipal court for the District of Columbia relating to the granting of an injunction or restraining order shall be applicable with respect to actions brought under this subsection, except that the District as complaining party shall not be required to furnish bond or security. It shall not be necessary for the court to find the building, ground, premises, or place was being unlawfully used as aforesaid at the time of the hearing, but on finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true, the court shall enter an order restraining the defendant from keeping, possessing, selling, exhibiting, manufacturing, bartering, or giving away publications, pictures, films, recordings, or other things and devices forbidden by this section. When an injunction, either temporary or permanent, has been granted, it shall be binding on the defendant throughout the District of Columbia. Upon final judgment of the court order ordering such nuisance to be abated, the court may order that the defendant, or anyone claiming under him, shall not occupy or use, for a period of one year thereafter, the building, ground, premises, or place upon which the nuisance existed, but the court may, in its discretion, permit the defendant to occupy or use the said building, ground, premises, or place, if the defendant shall give bond with sufficient security to be approved by the court, in the penal and liquidated sum of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, payable to the District of Columbia, and conditioned that the acts prohibited by this section shall not be done or permitted to be done in or upon the buildings, grounds, premises, or place. On violation of such bond the whole sum may be recovered as a penalty in the name of and for the District of Columbia and shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

"(g) In the case of the violation of any injunction, temporary or permanent, rendered pursuant to the provisions of this section, proceedings for punishment for contempt may be commenced by the Corporation Counsel, or any of his assistants, by filing with the court in the same case in which the injunction was issued a petition under oath setting out the alleged offense constituting the violation and serving a copy of said petition upon the defendant requiring him to appear and answer the same within ten days from the service thereof. The trial shall be promptly held and may be upon affidavits or either party may demand the production and oral examination of the witnesses. Any person found guilty of contempt under the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than twelve months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

SEC. 2. Subsection (c) of section 866 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, sec. 22–1505, 1951 edition), is amended to read as follows:

"(c) All moneys, vehicles, furnishings, fixtures, equipment, stock (including, without limitation, furnishings and fixtures adaptable to nongambling uses, and equipment and stock for printing, recording, computing, transporting, safekeeping, or communication), or other things of value used or to be used—

"(1) in carrying on or conducting any lottery, or the game or device commonly known as a policy lottery or policy, contrary to the provisions of section 863 of this Act;

"(2) in setting up or keeping any gaming table, bank, or device contrary to the provisions of section 865 of this Act; or

"(3) in maintaining any gambling premises, shall be subject to seizure by any member of the Metropolitan Police force, or the United States Park Police, or the United States marshal, or any deputy marshal, for the District of Columbia, and any property seized shall be proceeded against in the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia by libel action brought in the name of the District of Columbia by the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants, and shall, unless good cause be shown to the contrary, be forfeited to the District of Columbia and shall be made available for the use of any agency of the government of the District of Columbia, or otherwise disposed of as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, by order or by regulation provide: Provided, That if there be bona fide liens against the property so forfeited, then such property shall be disposed of by public auction. Bona fide liens against property so forfeited shall, on good cause shown by the lienor, be transferred from the property to the proceeds of the sale of the property. Forfeit moneys and other proceeds realized from the enforcement of this section shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia."

SEC. 3. This Act shall not be considered as affecting the authority vested in the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia by Reorganization Plan Numbered 5 of 1952 (66 Stat. 824), and the performance of any function vested by said plan in the Board of Commissioners or in any office or agency under the jurisdiction and control of said Board of Commissioners shall continue to be subject to delegation by said Board of Commissioners in accordance with section 3 of such plan. Any function vested by this Act in any agency established pursuant to such plan shall be deemed to be vested in said Board of Commissioners and shall be subject to delegation in accordance with said plan.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 1, strike the word "intriques" and insert in lieu thereof "intrigues".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the first section of this bill is to authorize the forfeiture of property which is used or which is to be used in connection with a violation of law relating to indecent publications (31 Stat. 1332; sec. 22–2201, D.C. Code, 1951 ed.). This section also provides that any "house, building, vessel, garage, shed, or other premises to which the public commonly resort or congregate for business or pleasure" which is used for the purposes of violating the law relating to indecent publications is declared to be a common nuisance and its use may be enjoined. In the case of a violation of any such injunction, proceedings for punishment for contempt may be commenced by the Corporation Counsel by filing a petition with the court in the same case in which the injunction was issued. Any person found guilty shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

Section 2 authorizes the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants to bring libel action against property seized under the gambling laws of the District of Columbia—section 866 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1901, as amended; section 22–1505, District of Columbia Code, 1951 edition. This amendment is necessitated by the fact that there are two libel cases now pending in the U.S. district court in which the Corporation Counsel sought to proceed in the name of the District of Columbia against certain property seized under the Gambling Act. The court ruled that the statute as now written does not permit the Corporation Counsel to file such a suit, even though under existing law the property is required to be forfeited to the District of Columbia. These two cases have been held by the court "pending further appropriate action."

Section 3 of this bill assures that the intent of Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1952 will be made applicable to the proposed amendment of existing law.

The U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia concurs in the suggested amendments.

This legislation also has the approval of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASSOCIATION FOR CHILDHOOD EDUCATION INTERNATIONAL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 685) to exempt from all taxation certain property of the Association for Childhood Education International in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was on the Private Calendar yesterday and by mutual agreement between the gentleman from South Carolina and myself, I asked that it be passed over and be brought up today. I reserve the right to object merely to propound a question of the gentleman from South Carolina in reference to this organization, the Association for Childhood Education International in the District of Columbia. Is that a long-established organization here in the District of Columbia, or is it one that has sort of come in relatively lately?

Mr. McMILLAN. It has been here over 70 years.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman feels it rightfully falls into this category of tax-exempt institutions?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. The facts have been investigated thoroughly for some years, and it has been found that it really deserves to be exempted.

Mr. AVERY. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina for this information on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the real property situated in square 1908 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, described as lots 11, 801, 806, and 807, owned by the Association for Childhood Education International, a District of Columbia corporation, and all personal property located thereon, is hereby exempt from all taxation so long as the same is owned, occupied, and used by the Association for Childhood Education International for its educational and other corporate purposes and is not used for commercial or income producing purposes, subject to the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 5 of the Act entitled "An Act to define the real property exempt from taxation in the District of Columbia," approved December 24, 1942 (56 Stat. 1089; D.C. Code, secs. 47–801b, 47–801c, and 47–801d).

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to exempt from taxation lots 11, 801, 806, and 807, situated in square 1908 in the city of Washington, D.C., owned by the Association for Childhood Education International, a District of Columbia corporation, and all personal property located thereon, so long as the same is owned, occupied, and used by the aforementioned association for its educational and other corporate purposes and is not used for commercial or income-producing purposes, subject to the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 5 of the act entitled "An act to define the real property exempt from taxation in the District of Columbia," approved December 24, 1942 (56 Stat. 1089; D.C. Code, secs. 47–801b, 47–801c, and 47–801e).

The purposes and objectives of the association, as set forth in its certificate of incorporation, are as follows: To work for the education and well-being of children; to promote desirable conditions, programs, and practices in the schools—nursery through elementary; to raise the standards of preparation and to encourage continued professional growth of teachers and leaders in this field; to bring into active cooperation all groups concerned with children in the school, the home, and the community; to inform the public of the needs of children and how the school program must be adjusted to fit these needs; to achieve this purpose, Association for Childhood Education International shall be guided by a dynamic philosophy of education which is flexible and responsive to human needs in a changing society.

The association is a District of Columbia charitable nonprofit educational corporation and is supported by dues from its members and income from the sale of its publications. The present assessed value of the land and improvements thereon is $24,262, and at the current tax rate of $2.30 per hundred, the tax loss to the District of Columbia would be $558.02 annually.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACTIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ON BEHALF OF MINORS

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2035) authorizing persons maintaining or defending actions in the District of Columbia on behalf of a minor to give releases of liability, and requiring persons receiving money or property in settlement of such actions or in satisfaction of a judgment in any such action to be appointed as guardian of the estate of such minor, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1189, ch. 854), as amended, is amended by inserting immediately after section 153 the following new section:

"SEC. 153A. (1) Any person entitled to maintain or defend an action in behalf of a minor child, including actions relating to real estate, shall be competent to settle or compromise any action so brought and, upon settlement or compromise thereof or upon satisfaction of any judgment obtained therein, shall be competent to give a full acquittance and release of all liability in connection with such action, but no such settlement or compromise shall be valid unless the same shall be approved by a judge of the court in which such action is pending.

"(2) Before any person shall receive any money or other property on behalf of a minor in settlement or compromise of any action brought on behalf of or against such minor or in satisfaction of any judgment in any such action, where (after deduction of fees, costs and all other expenses incident to the matter) the net value of said money and property due the minor exceeds $3,000, such person shall be duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction as guardian of the estate of such minor to receive such money or property, and shall have qualified as such."

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize persons maintaining or defending actions in the District of Columbia on behalf of a minor to give releases of liability, and to require persons receiving money or property in settlement of such actions or in satisfaction of a judgment in any such action to be appointed as guardian of the estate of such minor.

It was brought to the attention of the committee at a hearing that minors are frequently involved in lawsuits with respect to which compromises or settlements are effected. However, there is no provision of law which requires court approval of any such compromise or settlement as a means of insuring that it is in the best interests of the minor. Neither is there any provision of law which authorizes persons representing minors in the settlement or compromise of a lawsuit to give a complete release to the other party litigant in such action, when there is final disposition of the case.

Paragraph No. (1) of the proposed section 153A to be inserted in the act of March 3, 1901, as amended—31 Stat. 1189—authorizes persons representing minors in the maintenance or defense of actions to settle or compromise any such action and to give a complete release in connection therewith. The subsection further provides that no such settlement or compromise shall be valid unless approved by a judge of the court in which such action is pending.

It is also possible under existing law that when a minor involved in a lawsuit is to receive money or property in settlement or compromise thereof, the money or other property is received for him by persons not accountable to the court for the safekeeping of the same. There is no provision of law which requires a court-appointed guardian to receive and account for such money or other property. The appointment of a guardian is permissive with the court. The committee was informed that it sometimes happens that money or other property paid to a person on behalf of a minor has been dissipated, rather than used for the benefit of the minor.

Paragraph No. (2) of the proposed section 153A, would require the appointment and qualification of a guardian to receive any or all money or other property paid a minor in settlement or compromise of any action brought on behalf of or against such minor or in satisfaction of any judgment in any such action, where the net value of such money or other property is in excess of $3,000. This language will correct a situation which might be to the possible detriment of a minor.

This bill has the approval of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the Register of Wills of the U.S. District Court, whose office has general supervision over the estates of fiduciaries including guardians.

The enactment of this bill would not involve any expense to the Government of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJUDICATION OF PROPERTY RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1372) to extend the jurisdiction of the Domestic Relations Branch in the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia to cover the adjudication of property rights in certain actions arising in the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 105 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a Domestic Relations Branch in the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved April 11, 1956 (70 Stat. 111), is amended by inserting immediately after "actions for annulments of marriage;" the following: "determinations and adjudications of property rights, both real and personal, in any action hereinabove referred to in this section, irrespective of any jurisdictional limitation imposed on the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia;".

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to clarify and define the authority of the domestic relations branch in the municipal court to adjudicate the interests of husband and wife in personal and real property in the District of Columbia, in all actions coming before the domestic relations branch, other than proceedings in adoption.

The jurisdiction of this branch is set forth in section 105 of the act entitled "An act to establish a domestic relations branch in the municipal court for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved April 11, 1956, as follows:

Jurisdiction of domestic relations branch: The domestic relations branch and each judge sitting therein shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all actions for divorce from the bond of marriage and legal separation from bed and board, including proceedings incidental to such actions for alimony, pendente lite and permanent, and for support and custody of minor children; applications for revocation of divorce from bed and board; civil actions to enforce support of minor children; civil actions to enforce support of wife; actions seeking custody of minor children; actions to declare marriages void; actions to declare marriages valid; actions for annulments of marriage; and proceedings in adoption.

Since some members of the court have expressed concern as to whether the domestic relations branch in the municipal court has jurisdiction in these matters relating to the adjudication of property rights, your committee feels that it is desirable to resolve this doubt by specifically conferring jurisdiction upon the court.

This legislation has the approval of the Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE MINERAL LEASING ACT

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2181) to amend the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, as amended.

The clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 27 of the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437, 448), as amended (30 U.S.C., sec. 184), is further amended by the insertion, immediately after the sixteenth sentence, of the following: "The right of cancellation or forfeiture for violation of the provisions of this Act shall not apply so as to affect adversely the title or interest of a bona fide purchaser in any lease, option for a lease, or interest in a lease acquired in conformity with the acreage limitations of this Act from any other person, association or corporation whose holdings, or the holdings of a predecessor in title, including the original lessee of the United States, may have been canceled or forfeited, or may be subject to cancellation or forfeiture for any such violation. Any person, association or corporation who is a party to any proceedings with respect to a violation of any provision of this Act, shall have the right to be dismissed as such a party upon showing that the person, association or corporation acquired the interest involving him as such a bona fide purchaser without violating any provisions of this Act. If during any such proceedings with respect to a violation of any provisions of this Act, a party to those proceedings files with the Secretary of the Interior a waiver of his rights under the lease to drill or to assign his interests thereunder or if such rights are suspended by order of the Secretary pending a decision in such proceedings, he shall, if he is found in such proceedings not in violation of such provisions, have the right to have his interest extended for a period of time equal to the period between the filing of the waiver or the order of suspension by the Secretary and the final decision, without the payment of rental."

SEC. 2. The right granted by the second sentence of the amendment contained within section 1 of this Act shall apply with respect to any proceeding initiated either prior to or after the date of enactment of this Act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SAYLOR. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, S. 2181 is a noncontroversial bill, involving no additional cost to the Government. In fact, some savings should result.

The measure is urgently needed for the relief of a substantial number of bona fide purchasers of interests in Federal oil and gas leases involved in pending administrative proceedings.

The measure accomplishes this purpose by adding three provisions to the Mineral Leasing Act.

The first provision is that the right of the Department of the Interior to cancel leases, interests in leases, and options on account of a violation of any provision of the act shall not be exercised in such a way as to affect adversely the interest of any bona fide purchaser who is not himself in violation of the act.

The second provision is that bona fide purchasers shall have a right to be dismissed from pending or future proceedings which are based only upon a violation by a predecessor in interest.

The third provision is that leases of innocent parties shall be extended where drilling or lease assignment rights of the party are or have been administratively suspended by the Secretary of the Interior before a decision is reached in a pending or future proceeding, or where such rights are voluntarily waived by the party during the proceeding. The length of the extended period would correspond with the period that elapsed while drilling or assignment rights were suspended during the proceeding.

The need for this legislation arose out of three contest actions initiated this year by the Bureau of Land Management. These actions, if decided favorably to the Government, would cancel a total of 491 oil and gas leases embracing more than 284,000 acres in Wyoming and Montana. Some 254 individuals or firms are involved.

Orders have already been issued under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior administratively suspending drilling and assignment rights under the leases involved in the three pending contests. Under the bill, rental payments will be required on these leases during the pendency of the contests. If the contestees holding the leases are innocent, their leases would be eligible for the extended period as provided in the bill, and during the extended period no rental payments would be required. Royalty obligations, of course, would accrue at all times.

The contests have caused uncertainty on the part of the oil and gas industry. Counsel for major companies and independent operators have testified that there is hesitancy to make the necessary investments for development because of the danger that in the chain of title of a lease one of its prior holders may have been in violation of the act and that the lease might be subject to cancellation for this reason.

Development activity has been curtailed. Revenues to the States and to the reclamation fund are threatened with harm if the situation continues.

Mr. Speaker, S. 2181, as reported, consists of a Department of the Interior draft with clarifying amendments. The measure will reactivate development of the oil and gas resources of the public lands and will protect the equities of innocent operators and investors.

Mr. Speaker, the committee amendments to S. 2181 are clarifying in nature. It should be clearly understood that the amendments do not change the purpose or effect of the bill as it passed the other body.

The committee amendment on page 2, lines 2 and 3, makes it clear that the term "predecessor in title" includes the original lessee.

The amendments on page 2, lines 4–5, 14–15, and 21 merely strikes out unnecessary language.

The amendments on page 2, lines 8–9, and on page 3, separate a transitory provision from provisions having permanent effect. These particular amendments are not intended to have and do not have effect on the substance of the bill, and it is especially to be understood that the sentence on page 2, lines 12–25, will apply to the contest proceedings now pending in the Bureau of Land Management.

Mr. Speaker, the committee amendments which have been suggested by the committee handling the bill are clarifying amendments.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPINALL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Do I understand that the objections of the Department to this bill have been met by way of amendment?

Mr. ASPINALL. The gentleman is correct. This is only a small part of the original bill. This is to take care of this one matter that needs to be taken care of at the present time and we will come back with other legislation.

Mr. GROSS. But the objections as set out in the report have been substantially met?

Mr. ASPINALL. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, the legislation under consideration is the minimum required to meet an emergency situation which threatens to retard, or even stop, the production of oil and gas on the public lands, to the great detriment of the Nation, the States and local communities, and particularly to those thousands of people who depend upon this activity for their jobs and livelihood.

I sincerely thank all of those who have recognized this situation and have made possible the consideration of this legislation under suspension of the rules. For another reason, consideration under suspension of the rules is the appropriate method to follow. I am convinced that if every Member understands this legislation, it will meet with unanimous approval.

Congress can take justifiable pride in the way that the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, has operated to accomplish its purpose. The stated purpose of the act is "an act to promote the development of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain." Under the act, this has been accomplished to a remarkable extent, to the benefit of the Nation's economy and security. It has produced millions of dollars in Federal and State revenues. In a much simplified form, the way the act operates as far as oil and gas is concerned is this:

A person interested in the testing and development of certain public lands, which are not within a known producing area, files an application for a lease in the office of the Bureau of Land Management within the district in which the lands are located, at the same time tendering the payment of the required rentals. The application is examined, and if the Bureau of Land Management determines that the person is qualified, a lease is issued, signed by the proper officer for the Government and by the lessee. The lease may be assigned from time to time. Each assignment must be approved by the Government.

There is a limitation provided in the law as to the number of acres which any one person, association or corporation may have under lease in any one State. This is 46,080 acres. An additional 200,000 acres may be held by option in the State. In his application, the applicant must state that he is within the limitations, and in approving it, it must appear to the Secretary of the Interior that he is in compliance. It is with respect to this feature that the problem arises.

Let me say here and now, and once and for all, that the parties who are in violation would be wrongdoers, and no one has suggested that they should be given any consideration, and there is nothing in this legislation which would in any way operate in favor of the violator or wrongdoer. However, the Department of the Interior has recently, in three proceedings, two of which were initiated in Wyoming and one in Montana, undertaken by administrative action to cancel oil and gas leases, without regard for the fact that these leases have been assigned to an innocent purchaser for value or a bona fide purchaser, who has never been in violation of the acreage limitations or a party to a violation in any manner, and is in all other respects qualified to hold the lease. This is done on the theory that someone in the chain of title held more acreage than that allowed by law. I understand that other such actions are being considered.

I am sure that you can readily see how unfair the results of this action would be, and the effect of it on the business activity. Unless this legislation is enacted, the language of the Act and the actions of the Department under the Act may operate in direct opposition to the stated purpose, until it becomes an Act to stop the production of oil and gas on the public domain.

To accomplish the consistently expressed objective of Congress of providing for development of this natural resource requires the expenditures of substantial sums of money for exploration, drilling and development. No one can be expected to expend these funds unless they are protected from confiscation through no fault or wrongdoing of their own.

You would not think of building your house on a lot that might eventually, through no fault of your own, revert back to the Government. As a practical matter, just as when you are ready to build on your lot or when you acquire the lot, you seek a title opinion of a lawyer, before a lease is acquired or developed, a title opinion is required. With the position taken by the Department, there is no way of determining whether or not the title is good, so as to justify the expenditure of funds for purchase or development.

Frank M. Gallivan, an attorney at law in Cheyenne, Wyo., whose practice has been confined almost solely to oil and gas title problems, and principally as concerns Federal oil and gas leases, and who is a recognized authority in this field, testified before the House Interior Committee as follows:

> In most instances, the parties named as defendants in the alleged frauds were either predecessors in title, who had been original lessees, and had in years past retained an overriding royalty, or they were subsequent innocent purchasers for value.
> At the time of most of the purchases, there was no recorded evidence that the principal contestees involved in the contests had or claimed an interest in the leases, nor did any other available Government records reveal that any of the parties involved in the leasehold titles might have been in violation of the law.

The devastating effect of the filing of these cases does not come about from the lands involved in the cases themselves. It is the effect that the theory advanced has had upon other transactions which are essential to continued oil and gas activity on the public domain. As a result of the filing of these actions, in some cases of which I am advised, transfer of leases and actual development programs have already been stopped because the examining attorney has indicated that he would have to make an exception to the title and state that in his opinion, it was a good title only if in fact each and every person, association or corporation in the chain of title was within the acreage limitation.

There is no way of determining this. It has become almost universal practice among lawyers to make such exceptions. Banks and other lenders are naturally more cautious than purchasers. The effect on financing, which is so essential to oil and gas expansion, will be disastrous. It will affect a major portion of the 135,000 leases covering over 111 million acres of public lands. Something must be done in this session of Congress, before the next drilling season begins, if this is to be avoided.

I personally believe that the Secretary does not have the authority under the present act to cancel or forfeit a lease under these circumstances by administrative proceedings. I further believe that a court would refuse to cancel the lease, or at least the interest in the lease of an innocent person, but it would take years to finally litigate these questions. In at least one instance, an action has been commenced by one of the parties to enjoin the Secretary from proceeding to cancel by administrative action. Even if an injunction is issued, though, as I think it will be, the Department could then proceed to bring an action in court to cancel the lease, and it would be necessary to fully litigate that question. In the meantime, no one can purchase by assignment any Federal oil and gas lease.

The impact upon the economy of the area involved, the loss of employment, the loss to the Nation as a whole, and the disruption of the development of the public lands and the country's natural resources, contrary to the policy of the Congress, would be more than just significant. I think that Wyoming is a fairly typical public land State. Over 70 percent of the minerals are in the control of the Federal Government directly. This affects a much greater acreage. Development often requires a large block of acreage. Development even on the private lands within that block would be stopped if this cloud remains on the title to the Federal lands. The same would be true in other States.

To correct this situation, S. 2181 was introduced in the other body by the senior Senator from Wyoming, and H.R. 7787, an almost identical bill, was introduced in the House by myself. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. RIVERS], joined in sponsoring the legislation and introduced H.R. 8036.

These bills would have provided for rather extensive amendments to the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920. With reference to the situation I have described, the principal effects would have been, first, to remove the distinction between acreage held by lease and acreage held by option; second, to protect the innocent purchaser; third, to toll the running of the term of the lease under challenge; and fourth, where a lease was challenged for fraud, to give to the accused his traditional rights in a court of law, and to provide additional penalties if he was found guilty of fraud.

All of these things are essential to the full solution of the problem. Extensive hearings were held. Outstanding witnesses from all phases of the oil and gas industry were heard, as well as the Department. So far as I know, everyone agreed that these things were necessary and proper.

Removal of the distinction between holdings under lease and holdings under option is particularly important, because in various types of transactions, it is impossible to determine whether the acreage should be charged as leased acreage or acreage under option.

I am confident that no Member of Congress wants to put any citizen in this position of acting without being able to determine whether he is doing right or wrong. Unfortunately, some of these remedial actions, however, were, in the minds of some, so inseparably associated with other proposed changes in the act that it became apparent that the questions involved could not be resolved at this stage of the present session of the 86th Congress.

As a result, the bill presented to you for approval contains only protection for the innocent purchaser and provision for extension of the term of his lease for a period of time equal to that for which his rights to drill or assign the lease were suspended while his innocence was being determined.

I would like to emphasize that this will not completely solve the situation. To accomplish this, prompt action should be taken in the next session. At my request, H.R. 7787 and H.R. 8036 have not been reported by the House Interior Committee. My reason for requesting this is that full hearings have been held on these bills, and by retaining them in committee, prompt action will be facilitated.

As a minimum, though, the legislation before you must be passed. The only effect of it is to provide that the cancellation or forfeiture for violation of the provisions of the act shall not affect adversely the title or interest of a bona fide purchaser who acquired his interest in conformity with the acreage limitations of the act and is otherwise qualified; that the innocent purchaser will have the right to have his lease extended without payment of additional rentals for a period of time equal to that which he lost while his innocence was being determined; and to provide that a party in any proceedings now pending or later filed with respect to a violation of any provision of the Mineral Leasing Act shall have the right to be dismissed as such a party upon showing that he acquired the interest as a bona fide purchaser without violating any provisions of the act.

If this is done, activity can go forward for the next drilling season. If not, irreparable harm will be done to the national interest, to the areas involved, and to those who depend upon this activity for their jobs and livelihood.

Full hearings have been held by the House Interior and Insular Committee and before the corresponding committee of the other body. Outstanding citizens from every phase of the industry appeared as witnesses. The Department of Interior has fully considered the legislation. It has reported favorably. Its witnesses were heard. The legislation was reported by the committee unanimously. The facts are established. All have agreed.

I am confident that every Member of this House wants to protect the innocent. That is all this bill would do. I urge its favorable consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, S. 2181, as amended?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LOWER RIO GRANDE REHABILITATION PROJECT, TEXAS, LA FERIA DIVISION

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4279) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, rehabilitate, operate, and maintain the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project, Texas, La Feria division, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388 and Acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, including the last sentence of Section 1 of the Act of October 7, 1949 (63 Stat. 724), but subject to exceptions herein contained) is authorized to undertake the rehabilitation and betterment of the works of the La Feria Water Control and Improvement District, Cameron County numbered 3, Texas, and to operate and maintain the same. Such undertaking which shall be known as the La Feria division of the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project, shall not be commenced until a repayment contract has been entered into by said district under the Federal reclamation laws, subject to exceptions herein contained, which contract shall provide for payment of the capital cost of the La Feria division over a basic period of not more than thirty-five years, and shall, in addition, in lieu of the excess-land provisions of the Federal reclamation laws, require the payment of interest on that pro rata share of the capital cost, which is attributable to furnishing benefits in each particular year to land held in private ownership by any one owner in excess of one hundred and sixty irrigable acres, said interest to be at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury by estimating the average annual yield to maturity, on the basis of daily closing market bid quotations or prices during the month of May preceding the fiscal year in which the repayment contract is entered into, on all outstanding marketable obligations of the United States having a maturity date of fifteen or more years from the first day of such month of May, and by adjusting such estimated average annual yield to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum.

SEC. 2. Title to all lands and works of the division, to the extent an interest has been vested in the United States, shall pass to the La Feria Water Control and Improvement District, Cameron County numbered 3 or its designee or designees upon payment to the United States of all obligations arising under this Act or incurred in connection with this division of the project.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the work to be undertaken pursuant to the first section of this Act, the sum of $6,000,000 (January 1959 costs), plus such amount, if any, as may be required by reason of changes in costs of work of the types involved as shown by engineering indices.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4279 would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, rehabilitate, operate, and maintain the La Feria division of the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project, Texas. The plan of rehabilitation is designed to permit more economical operation and maintenance of the irrigation district's irrigation works, provide more efficient water deliveries, reduce distribution system losses, and reduce flooding in some areas.

The legislation authorizes the appropriation of $6 million for the project. Following the usual procedure, the actual appropriation of funds would be made later in the annual Public Works Appropriation Acts.

The La Feria division consists of the existing irrigation and drainage works of the La Feria Water Control and Improvement District, Cameron County, No. 3. The district is 1 of 37 water control and improvement districts in the lower Rio Grande Valley. The diversion and distribution works have been in continuous operation for over 40 years. The district's system is capable of serving 27,000 acres of irrigable land but it is in urgent need of modernization and improvements for efficient and economical operation. About 2 acre-feet of water out of every 3 diverted into the distribution system are lost through seepage or other waste. It is estimated that the rehabilitation of the works will permit the saving of some 15,000 acre-feet of water annually. With the constantly increasing use of Rio Grande water for irrigation, this rehabilitation is necessary to assure the La Feria division of a continued adequate supply of water.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize two points with respect to the economic aspects of the La Feria project. The cost, estimated at $6 million, will be fully repaid in a period of 35 years, with interest on that very small part which is attributable to furnishing benefits to ownerships in excess of 160 acres. The district has already agreed to these repayment arrangements. The other point I want to emphasize is the fact that the benefits from this development would be about 5 times the costs and, from an economic standpoint, this is one of the best projects our committee has considered.

This project does not bring into production any new land or change the existing crop pattern to any extent. It merely provides for more efficient operation of the works serving the existing lands. Fruits and vegetables, and some cotton, are the principle crops grown in the La Feria district. The average size farm is approximately 80 acres and out of 1,868 farms, only 11 exceed 160 acres and the largest single farm is 361 acres.

The Department of the Interior has submitted a project feasibility report to the Congress and a report on this legislation to the committee, both of which recommend the authorization and construction of the La Feria division. Both reports have been reviewed and cleared by the Bureau of the Budget. Although there is some local opposition to the rehabilitation work because of the cost to be assessed against the water users, the district has approved the project and the proposed repayment contract by a favorable vote at an election called for that purpose.

The La Feria division is an excellent project and urgently needed and I hope that H.R. 4279 will be passed.

Mr. Speaker, the entire $6 million involved in this project will be repaid. It is a very worthy project and one that is needed to have the water that otherwise is going to waste.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question concerning the types of crops which will be grown in this rehabilitation area. It is my understanding that most of the area will produce fruits and vegetables and only a small percentage of it will produce cotton.

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. That is right. This is the winter garden area of Texas. It is in the Rio Grande Valley area and most of it is truck gardening. These farmers who are involved are all small farmers; these are all small tracts, I believe around 80 acres. They are farms of that kind on which people live and from which they make their living. The water that is presently being used is lost, two-thirds of it that comes through the canal is lost. When you lose 66⅔ percent of the water, it is a serious situation so far as the economy is concerned. In my opinion it will not increase the production of any surplus crops. I think the record before the committee will show that.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the finest examples of a reclamation project that has been brought before the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs since I have been a member. This is a type of project, which, in my opinion, the Reclamation Act was originally passed to take care of. These are small home farms producing what are known as row crops producing food for consumption and not for the Commodity Credit Corporation. I certainly feel the House is taking the proper action today in this suspension of the rules. I urge the suspension of the rules and the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4279, with amendments?

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CLEM MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 281, nays 114, not voting 39, as follows:

ENACTING THE PROVISIONS OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 1 OF 1959 WITH CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7681) to enact the provisions of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1959 with certain amendments, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, except as otherwise provided in section 2 hereof, the following functions are hereby transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture:

(a) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of March 20, 1922, 42 Stat. 465, as amended (16 U.S.C. 485, 486), with respect to exchanges of non-Federal lands for national forest lands or timber.

(b) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of February 2, 1922 (42 Stat. 362), with respect to exchanges of lands in private ownership within or within six miles of the Deschutes National Forest for national forest lands, or for timber from any national forest, in the State of Oregon.

(c) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 643), except section 2 thereof, with respect to exchanges of privately owned lands for national forest timber in New Mexico.

(e) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of April 21, 1926 (44 Stat. 303), except section 2 thereof, with respect to exchanges of privately owned lands for national forest lands or timber in New Mexico and Arizona.

(f) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act of May 26, 1926 (44 Stat. 655; 16 U.S.C. 38), with respect to exchanges of lands held in private or State ownership for national forest lands or timber in Montana.

(g) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of June 15, 1926 (44 Stat. 746), with respect to exchanges of State lands for national forest lands in New Mexico.

(h) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of December 7, 1942 (56 Stat. 1042), with respect to exchange transactions in which lands under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture are exchanged for State lands in Minnesota which are to be under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture after their acquisition by the United States.

(i) The function of the Secretary of the Interior (originally vested in the Commissioner of the General Land Office) under section 6 of the Act of April 28, 1930 (46 Stat. 257; 43 U.S.C. 872), with respect to execution of quitclaim deeds for lands conveyed to the United States in connection with exchange transactions involving lands under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

(j) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2(b) of the Joint Resolution of August 8, 1947 (61 State. 921), with respect to appraisals and sales of certain lands within the Tongass National Forest.

(k) The functions of the Secretary of the Interior under section 10 of the Act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. 962; 16 U.S.C. 519), with respect to sales of small tracts of acquired national forest lands found chiefly valuable for agriculture.

SEC. 2(a). In no case covered by subsections (a), (b), (e), (g), and (h) of section 1 hereof shall the exchange provide for the patenting of land by the United States without a reservation of minerals (1) unless the Secretary of Agriculture has obtained the advice of the Secretary of the Interior that the land is nonmineral in character, or (2) unless the Secretary of the Interior approves of the valuation and disposition of the minerals in the lands to be patented. A sale of land covered by subsection (j) of section 1 hereof shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture without a reservation of minerals only after consultation with, and the approval of, the Secretary of the Interior as to the valuation and disposition of the minerals. No lands of the United States shall be exchanged in any case covered by subsection (f) of section 1 hereof unless the Secretary of Agriculture has obtained the advice of the Secretary of the Interior that such lands are nonmineral in character.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to determine or adjudicate the validity or invalidity of any mining claim or part thereof.

(c) Nothing in subsection (l) of section 1 hereof shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of coal, phosphate, sodium, potassium, oil, oil shale, gas, or sulfur, or to dispose of any minerals which would be subject to disposal under the mining laws if said laws were applicable to the lands in which the minerals are situated.

(d) Upon approval by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to the provisions of this Act of any exchange or sale, respectively, of national forest lands under the provisions of law referred to in subsections (a), (b), (e), (f), (g), and (j) of section 1, hereof, the Secretary of the Interior, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall issue the patent therefor.

(e) All conveyances under the Act referred to in subsection (h) of section 1 hereof of national forest lands reserved from the public domain shall, upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made by the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 7681 would enact the basic provisions of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1959, with certain amendments which the Committee on Government Operations believes are needed to protect the public interest. The committee held hearings on the plan and found it subject to several serious objections. The committee also recognized that the plan would eliminate some duplication and overlapping of functions and be in the public interest if certain objectionable features were eliminated. However, under the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended—title 5, United States Code, section 133z—no provision is made whereby either the Congress or either House can amend the plan as such, without separate legislation. Accordingly, the committee recommended the adoption of House Resolution 295 to disapprove the plan—see House Report No. 586, 86th Congress—and the House adopted the resolution on July 7, 1959. The committee also recommended adoption of the bill H.R. 7681, as amended, which would enact the beneficial features of the plan, together with some amendments to the plan which the committee believes are in the public interest.

The principal effects of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1959, as transmitted by the President, would have been as follows:

First. It would have transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture all the functions of the Secretary of the Interior in making exchanges of public national forest lands for private lands and in making sales of such lands, except the purely ministerial function of issuing patents or conveyances for such land. H.R. 7681 retains some of these functions in the Secretary of the Interior; namely, those relating to retention or disposition of minerals in the lands to be patented.

Second. The plan would have transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture all the functions of the Secretary of the Interior in selling certain mineral materials on acquired national forest lands. H.R. 7681 contains provisions to insure that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not use the materials act to dispose of minerals which are subject to the mineral leasing acts and the mining law.

Third. The plan would have specifically authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to redelegate the functions transferred to him by the plan to any officer or employee of the Agriculture Department pursuant to section 4(a)—and without complying with the provisions of 4(b)—of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 (67 Stat. 633). This provision is not contained in H.R. 7681.

The committee believes H.R. 7681 will enact the positive and beneficial features of the plan. In addition, the bill makes several amendments to the plan. These amendments would, first, insure that the Secretary of the Interior would continue to have responsibility and functions with respect to minerals in the lands which are exchanged or sold; second, insure that the Secretary of Agriculture would not assume the function of determining or adjudicating the validity of mining claims which conflict with forest exchange or sale applications; third, insure that the Secretary of Agriculture would not, under the Materials Act, dispose of minerals subject to the mineral leasing or mining laws; and fourth, omit a reference in the President's plan which would have permitted a broad and unlimited delegation of authority without any obligation to provide advance public notice and opportunity for the public to express views or take action on the proposed delegation.

The enactment of the bill will eliminate duplication of work on such matters as checking legal titles, processing papers through the Land Office, publication of notices of pending exchanges, cross-checking between the departments on the status of cases being processed, and in other respects. The bill will also remove inconveniences to the public which have resulted from the fact that persons wishing to make exchanges or to purchase certain lands or certain common mineral materials on forest lands must deal with two offices—one in the Agriculture Department and one in the Interior Department. Under the bill all dealings by the public on the subjects covered would, in general, be solely with the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture. Any cross-checking that may be required can be accomplished by the Forest Service at the same time it is processing other phases of the transaction and thus all delays now found in the relationship of the two departments can be avoided.

H.R. 7681 was reported by the Committee on Government Operations on July 3, 1959. At that time Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1959 had not yet been disapproved. Consequently, and naturally, at that time the executive departments and the Bureau of the Budget expressed opposition to the bill and support of the plan.

Following the disapproval of the plan, the chairman of the committee ascertained that the executive agencies then desired the enactment of most of the provisions of H.R. 7681. Disagreement existed only with respect to section 2(a) of the bill. As reported by the committee, section 2(a) would require the Secretary of the Interior to participate in and approve determinations involving, first, whether lands are mineral or nonmineral in character; second, whether or not minerals shall be reserved to the United States; and third, the value of mineral rights in land; and, as amended by the committee, the bill further would require that any regulations made concerning the matters covered by section 2(a) must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture.

The agencies believed that as reported section 2(a) might complicate the handling of forest exchanges. Consequently, a revised section 2(a) has been worked out which is acceptable to the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior, and the Bureau of the Budget. Under the revision which has been agreed upon, forest lands could be patented by the Secretary of Agriculture without a reservation of minerals in exchange for private lands under subsections (a), (b), (e), (g), and (h) of section 1 only if he had been advised by the Secretary of the Interior that the land to be patented is nonmineral in character or if he has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior as to the valuation and disposition of the minerals in the lands to be patented. Lands would be exchanged under subsection (f) of section 1 only if the Secretary of Agriculture had been advised by the Secretary of the Interior that the lands to be conveyed by the United States were nonmineral in character. No reference is made in the revised section 2(a) to exchanges under subsections (c) and (d) of section 1 since both of those subsections are concerned solely with exchange of national forest timber for privately owned lands. In addition, the revised section 2(a) provides that sales of certain lands within the Tongass National Forest in Alaska, under subsection (j) of section 1, may be made by the Secretary of Agriculture without a reservation of minerals only after having consulted with the Secretary of the Interior and having obtained his approval as to the valuation and disposition of the minerals.

As I have stated, the two departments and the Budget Bureau have agreed to the revised amendment.

I am informed that the eminent chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, who strongly urged the disapproval of the reorganization plan as it was originally presented by the President, also concurs in the amendment which I shall propose.

The revised section 2(a) will assure (a) that determinations as to the mineral character of the land to be exchanged will be the responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior, and (b) that the Secretary of Agriculture will not dispose of minerals in forest exchanges and sales without the concurrence of the Secretary of the Interior. This takes care of the two major objections to the plan.

Mr. Speaker, I believe H.R. 7681 will achieve efficiency and economy in our Government, remove some of the overlapping and duplication in connection with exchanges and sales of public national forest lands, and disposal of common mineral materials in such lands, remove certain inconveniences to the public, and help give us protection against the disposal of Government-owned minerals for less than value. I urge the adoption of the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], the author of this bill, has explained, this measure, H.R. 7681, was originally introduced by him on June 11, 1959, and reported to the House on July 6, 1959, for the purpose of doing approximately the same thing as was provided in the Reorganization Plan No. 1, submitted by the President of the United States. At the time Reorganization Plan No. 1 was before the House, considerable controversy arose over the reporting of the bill, H.R. 7681, without, what the minority believed, were proper hearings. As a result, a minority report was filed at that time with the bill which, of course, no longer pertains to this measure inasmuch as it has been amended and changed, or will be by the adoption of this amendment. This amendment was worked out, as the gentleman from Iowa has so ably explained by the majority and minority members of the subcommittee of which I was the ranking member.

I am taking charge of the time on the bill on this side of the House today at the request of the ranking member of the full committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

This amendment was worked out to the satisfaction of the members of the subcommittee and of the full committee, and also to the satisfaction of the Bureau of the Budget, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of the Interior. So we have agreed completely, fully and unanimously on the approval of this bill with the amendment as has been reported by the gentleman from Iowa. So, therefore, I hope there will be full support for the measure as amended.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks on the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the rules be suspended and the bill be passed.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMIT VESSEL "JOHN F. DREWS" TO AMERICAN REGISTRY

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3792) to admit the vessel John F. Drews to American registry and to permit its use in the coastwise trade while it is owned by Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corp. of New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 4132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (46 U.S.C. 11), and section 27 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, as amended (46 U.S.C. 883), the vessel now known as the "John F. Drews" (F–X–Tioga; WYT–74 (Calumet (USCG)), documented under United States registry with official number 252202, built in 1894 in Buffalo, New York, presently under Canadian registry by permission of transfer order numbered MA–4583, and owned on the date of this Act by Merritt-Chapman and Scott Corporation of New York, shall be admitted to American registry and shall be entitled to engage in the coastwise trade and to transport passengers and merchandise between points in the United States, including districts, Territories, and possessions thereof embraced within the coastwise laws, for so long as such vessel is from the date of enactment of this Act continuously owned by Merritt-Chapman and Scott Corporation of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Washington for 20 minutes.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may need.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the readmission of the vessel John F. Drews to American registry and to permit its use in the coastwise trade while it is owned by Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corp. of New York.

The John F. Drews is the former U.S. Coast Guard tug, Calumet, built of steel construction in 1894 at Buffalo, N.Y. The vessel is 124 gross tons, 900 horsepower, and is 90.7 feet in length.

A little more than a year ago this vessel was transferred to Canadian registry with the approval of the Federal Maritime Administration, for the specific purpose of being used in conjunction with dredging and marine construction operations in the St. Lawrence Seaway and power development project, in which the U.S. Government is a participant.

Under present law, vessels which formerly had coastwise privileges by virtue of having been built in or documented under the laws of the United States cannot reacquire such privileges after having been placed under foreign registry—section 27, Merchant Marine Act, 1920, as amended; 46 U.S.C. 883. Thus, this bill is necessary to permit the vessel, John F. Drews, to reacquire rights to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States which it had had for some 64 years since the time of her construction in 1894.

The committee felt that in this case there were meritorious circumstances which justify making an exception to the general law.

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. SHELLEY. It is to be understood that the passage of this bill—I do not object to the bill—will not be allowed to be taken as a precedent for other people who have vessels under foreign flags to rush in and get them under American registry?

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. The committee has written its recommendation into the report that this is a meritorious case that justifies the exemption. This committee has no intention of opening the door to the registration of foreign-registered vessels. This was an American-built vessel. It was needed for a short time for use in connection with the St. Lawrence Seaway. The committee felt it was justified in presenting this bill. This bill is not to be taken as setting a precedent.

Mr. SHELLEY. I noted the stipulation in the report but I think it should be emphasized in the debate on the floor. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out, there is no opposition to the measure, at least, to my knowledge. This situation is a rather exceptional one. The committee so considered it and took the position that this should not set a precedent. Because of the necessity for the use of the vessel in Canadian waters it had to comply with Canadian registry. Now that work on the seaway is finished it is desired that the vessel be transferred back under the American flag. The committee feels it is a meritorious proposal and recommends that the bill be approved.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTINUING RESEARCH ON THE BIOLOGY FLUCTUATIONS, STATUS, AND STATISTICS OF MIGRATORY MARINE SPECIES OF GAME FISH

Mr. LENNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5004) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to undertake continuing research on the biology fluctuations, status, and statistics of the migratory marine species of game fish of the United States and contiguous waters.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to undertake a comprehensive continuing study of the migratory marine fish of interest to recreational fishermen of the United States, including species inhabiting the offshore waters of the United States and species which migrate through or spend a part of their lives in the inshore waters of the United States. The study shall include, but not be limited to, research on migrations, identity of stocks, growth rates, mortality rates, variations in survival, environmental influences, both natural and artificial, including pollution, and effects of fishing on the species, for the purpose of developing wise conservation policies and constructive management activities.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized (1) to acquire lands, construct laboratory or other buildings, purchase boats, acquire such other equipment and apparatus, and to employ such officers and employees as he deems necessary; (2) to cooperate or contract with State and other institutions and agencies upon such terms and conditions as he determines to be appropriate; and (3) to make public the results of such research conducted pursuant to the first section of this Act.

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act: Provided, That no more than $2,700,000 be appropriated for this purpose in any one fiscal year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). Is a second demanded?

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LENNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5004 is, in the considered judgment of many people, an essential piece of natural resources legislation. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to undertake continuing research on the biology fluctuations, status, and statistics of the migratory marine species of game fish of the United States and contiguous waters.

The Department of the Interior, in its report on this legislation, states that it already has broad authority in the Fish and Wildlife Act of 1956 to permit undertaking the research activities covered in H.R. 5004. But, not 1 cent has been budgeted for this important work, and the Department states that nothing is planned. We can then only conclude that the authority in the act of 1956 is in fact inadequate or has been completely ignored. Apparently, now, a more direct and enforcible statement of authority and congressional intent is required.

They do agree with the objectives of this proposal, and I call your attention to the language found in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior which is part of the committee report.

We have impressive research and management programs for waterfowl and other game. We have equally impressive programs for the important fresh-water sport fisheries. According to the Department of Interior, we have in excess of 100 Federal fish hatcheries throughout the country constructed at a cost in excess of $60 million. It is interesting to note the construction costs of Federal fish hatcheries during the past 3 years and the amounts appropriated for fiscal year 1960. In fiscal year 1957, $1,601,000; in fiscal year 1958, $2,330,000; in fiscal year 1959, $2,630,350. The appropriation for fiscal year 1960 is $1,500,650.

In addition, the U.S. Corps of Engineers has over a period of years transferred to the Bureau of Sport Fisheries an average of $1,500,000 annually for the construction of inland fish hatcheries.

We have appropriated for fiscal year 1960 for research and administrative overhead to improve the Federal inland fish hatcheries products the sum of $6 million. But, there has not been 1 cent in any of these Federal programs over the years for research on important marine sport fisheries.

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service undertook a survey for the year 1955 pertaining to the sports fisheries that year. It revealed that 58.6 million man-days were supported by the marine sport fisheries that year. This was in contrast to our waterfowl program, which showed 19.6 million hunting days for that year, for which the Congress appropriated $4 million of Federal funds last year. This survey showed that in 1955 the millions of Americans who utilized coastal marine sport fishing resources spent $488,999,000 for the goods and services required for fishing on coastal marine waters.

Projected over the intervening years and based on an estimated increase in the numbers of anglers amounting to a conservative 3½ percent annually, salt water sport fishermen generated an estimated $540 million of business activity in 1958. It is significant to note that this amount is equivalent to more than one-half the total retail business generated by the entire U.S. commercial fishing industry.

Marine sports fishing is a vital factor in every coastal area's economy. In my own State the salt water fishermen spend in excess of $35 million annually for goods and services. The figure is considerably larger in some of the New England coastal States, New York and New Jersey. The same can be said of the State of Florida, the Gulf States, including Texas, and, of course, the Pacific Coastal States. Much of our expanding small boatbuilding industry receives its principal stimulus from the demand for craft to service sport fishermen. Many of our commercial fishermen are finding their work increasingly unprofitable and are looking to charter boating as a means of supporting their families.

The survey I have already mentioned indicated that the average daily catch of salt water fish was about 4½ pounds per angler per day. The 1958 harvest of edible fish caught by the salt water angler approximated 290 million pounds. This is more than 12 percent of the total quantity of edible fish taken in the entire U.S. commercial catch. Obviously, sport salt water fish make an important contribution of nutritious food at the American table, as well as provide vast opportunities for needed recreation and, of course, afford sizable stimulus to business and industry.

Approximately 80 million people, almost half of the population of our country, live in coastal States on the Atlantic, Pacific, or Gulf States.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries believe that it is in the public interest that this bill be passed. It would make the intent of Congress crystal clear with respect to its desire for continuing research in this important field.

The bill sets a limit on the amount that may be appropriated in any year for this program. This is one-half of 1 percent of the amount of retail business generated by salt water sport fishing in 1958. This figure is $540 million. One-half of 1 percent would be $2,700,000 annually. By comparison, the sum of $21,438,000 was requested for fiscal 1960 to benefit the commercial fishing industry.

I repeat, this is an essential piece of natural resources legislation, and I urge the Members of the House to support the bill.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENNON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend this legislation to the favorable consideration of the House at this time. I have in mind my own case, and also a case of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CRAMER], both of us having introduced legislation to authorize research laboratories on salt water; however, it seems to me that if a general authority were given to the Department to do that it would not then throw into the legislative branch the selection of sites for these necessary laboratories, but instead would authorize and direct the Department itself to select sites on a fair and proper basis. Therefore, the gentleman has done a great service in introducing this legislation, and I support him and commend him for his very great interest in this whole subject of salt-water fisheries and marine life studies.

Mr. LENNON. I thank the gentleman from Washington. I know that he is familiar with the letter that was sent to the chairman of the full committee by Mr. Ross Leffler, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and the last two paragraphs of that letter in which he sets forth the very strong feeling that they are in agreement with the principles and objectives we are seeking in this legislation.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LENNON] as well as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] have stated the case well, and I believe the matter needs no further clarification. I urge the House to approve the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EFFECT OF INSECTICIDES UPON FISH AND WILDLIFE

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5813) to amend the act of August 1, 1958, to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to undertake continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides, fungicides, and other pesticides, upon fish and wildlife for the purpose of preventing losses of those invaluable natural resources, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2 of the Act of August 1, 1958 providing for continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides, fungicides, and other pesticides, upon fish and wildlife for the purpose of preventing losses of those invaluable natural resources and for other purposes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The sum of $2,565,000 per annum is hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the objectives of this Act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TOLLEFSON. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill will authorize expansion of the research presently underway to protect our fish and wildlife resources from the lethal effects of the various chemicals under development and in use for the control of agricultural pests. Almost daily, new compounds are being utilized in the constant war against the many organisms that seek to destroy our food supply. Unfortunately, however effective they may be for the purposes for which they are developed, there is no doubt that they have become increasingly deadly to our fish and wildlife resources.

Substances used in the campaign against the fire ant have proven extremely destructive to wildlife in the treated areas and even very small quantities of some newly developed sprays have destroyed whole fish populations when their residues have been washed into lakes and streams. The aim of the bill is to step up research to discover means to protect our wildlife, either through development of new formulas which confine their effects to the pests sought to be controlled, or by different methods of application to minimize the loss of fish and wildlife.

Last year the Congress authorized the expenditure of $280,000 per year for this purpose. The committee recommended this amount to permit a start on this most necessary work to be made, with full knowledge that the time would come when more money would be needed. The preliminary work so far undertaken indicates that the need for protection of our wildlife is far greater than suspected and that vastly increased effort is called for, lest we lose whole species by our delay.

I know that the authorization contained in this bill is far less than has been spent on a single pest control campaign and I believe that it is necessary to prevent extinction of some of our most desirable wildlife species.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, as the report on this bill indicates, the last Congress passed a similar bill which authorized an expenditure of $280,000 annually to do the kind of work authorized by this bill. Experience under that last bill indicates that that amount of money authorized was not sufficient and, in effect, all that this bill does is to increase the authorization. The testimony indicated rather clearly, the committee thought, the need for increasing the authorization because of the work done in the use of insecticides by the Department of Agriculture. There is clear need for an increase in the authorization, and I trust the House will approve this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. METCALF].

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, Public Law 85–582, enacted on August 1, 1958, directed the Secretary of the Interior to begin continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides and fungicides upon fish and wildlife.

Passage of the bill was preceded by hearings before the Fisheries and Wildlife Subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on my H.R. 783 and S. 2447 by the senior Senator from Washington, Senator MAGNUSON.

Testimony before those subcommittees documented the urgent need to determine the amounts, percentages or mixtures of these chemicals that can be used effectively in the necessary spraying of crop, range, wet, and timber land while minimizing the loss of fish, wildlife, poultry and farm animals.

Investigations made under the act of August 1, 1958, have, in the words of the departmental report of the Secretary of the Interior, shown the need for "a continuing research effort of much greater magnitude than is currently authorized." So this bill would increase the amount authorized for these needed investigations to $2,565,000. This is the amount actually needed to enable the Secretary of the Interior to study various aspects of the pesticides problem to assure that the future use of chemical controls shall not inflict irreparable damage on this Nation's fish and game resources and farm animals.

The authorization contained in this bill represents less than 1 percent of the wholesale value of the chemical sprays produced commercially in this country in 1956. Surely, this is a modest investment in the protection of fish and wildlife resources which, in 1955, generated nearly $3 billion in sales of goods and services to the Nation's more than 30 million hunters and fishermen.

The use of sprays for agricultural, forestry, and other purposes has grown phenomenally since 1940. That year, chemical controls had a wholesale value of $40 million. Their 1956 wholesale value was $290 million. This figure is expected to pass the $1 billion mark by 1975.

One-sixth of all the croplands and millions of acres of forests, rangelands, and marshlands—most of them important fish and wildlife habitat—are treated with pesticides each year. Some of these areas are sprayed several times. At least 3 billion pounds of these chemicals were sprayed over more than 70 million acres of our crop and timberland to kill insects, weeds, and plant diseases last year. Each year, more acres are being sprayed more efficiently and with deadlier poisons as development of new controls, with almost unlimited funds, races ahead of research. Today, more than 200 basic pesticides and more than 6,000 brand-named products are on the market.

Of course, there is economic justification for such a control program. The Department of Ariculture estimates that insects alone cause losses exceeding $4 billion a year. Everyone appreciates the need for minimizing the pest damage to forests and farmland. But this control program also involves a multibillion dollar recreation and commercial fishery industry of interest to at least 40 million Americans. According to a recent survey, America has some 30 million sportsmen. They spend approximately $3 billion and 567 million man-days hunting and fishing each year. Caring for tourists is a major industry in many States—among them Montana, where the tourist business is our third-largest industry.

Sportsmen, conservationists, foresters and farmers have a common interest in minimizing damage to crops and to wildlife.

We all know of plant or wildlife loss from chemical controls—such as the death of fish in Montana trout streams in areas sprayed by DDT; the virtual wiping out of quail and rabbit populations in two areas treated with heptachlor in the South. Considerable damage to valuable fish and wildlife resources has occurred unnecessarily because chemicals were applied without sufficient knowledge of accepted procedures or without full regard to the consequences.

Actually we know very little of even the direct effects of many control agents on plants, animals, soils and soil organisms. We know even less about the indirect, accumulative, long-time effects of these controls upon plants, wildlife—and man.

Experts tell us the toxicity of these chemicals depends on many things—among them the species, formulation, dosage, period of feeding or exposure, mode of entry into the body and various environmental and other conditions.

Some of these poisons persist in the soil for periods of 3 to 5 years or longer. Certain food chain organisms, such as earthworms, living in treated soil or waters, tend to concentrate the poison in their body tissue. Hence, birds, like the quail, woodcock and robin, as well as aquatic creatures—fish, crabs, shrimp and oysters—are affected when they feed upon contaminated organisms.

Studies made to date show that DDT may kill fish and other aquatic life when applied at dosage rates in excess of one-quarter pound per acre; 2 pounds per acre will kill birds; 5 pounds will cause heavy mortality among mammals. Other insecticides such as heptachlor, dieldrin, aldrin and endrin, have acute toxicity ranges of 15 to 200 times that of DDT.

Pheasants, quail, and other species exposed to sublethal amounts of some pesticides in food, suffer delayed chronic effects in the form of reduced reproductive capacity and survival of young. Persistent high levels of DDT have been found in the bodies of fish months after temporary concentrations in the stream environment had dissipated. Bird numbers in several areas treated with heptachlor for imported fire ant control, have been found to be reduced 75 to 85 percent. Populations of quail, wild turkey and rabbits were decimated in some of the areas. In other parts of the country, particularly the Midwest, local populations of robins and other songbirds have been depleted as a result of measures carried out for mosquito and Dutch elm disease control.

Aerial spraying of salt water marshes, particularly in the East, and of land areas adjacent to inshore water reaches important fish-producing water by drainage. Thus there is need to determine the effects of pesticides on inshore aquatic life—fish, shrimp, and shellfish—which live in these waters as adults, and on these species for which the marshes and estuaries are essential nursery grounds. Menhaden, shad, striped bass, croakers, and weakfish live in these areas during their early stages. Shrimp, crabs, oysters, and clams, which support major commercial fisheries, spend part or all of their lives in inshore environment.

There are four major objectives of the research program which would be made possible by enactment of this bill. They are to:

Determine the acute and chronic toxicities of some 200 basic pesticidal chemicals on the market, plus the many which are in various stages of development;

Conduct chemical analyses of plant and animal tissue to determine the presence of pesticide residues, to develop diagnostic procedures for determining suspected poisonings, and to measure the degree and duration of toxic conditions in fish and wildlife habitats;

Carry out field appraisals of immediate and long-range effects of pest control operations upon fish and wildlife populations;

Facilitate the compilation and dissemination of findings from research studies so that chemists, entomologists, and others may apply such knowledge in the development of new pest control materials, formulations, and techniques of application to minimize hazards to desirable forms of animal life.

This research would give us the information needed so desperately if we are to protect our valuable wildlife resources while at the same time minimizing pest damage to our forests and farmland.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5813?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

DIRECTING SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO UNDERTAKE CONTINUING STUDIES OF THE EFFECTS OF INSECTICIDES AND SO FORTH

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 1575) to amend the act of August 1, 1958, to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to undertake continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides, fungicides, and other pesticides, upon fish and wildlife for the purpose of preventing losses of those invaluable natural resources, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2 of the Act of August 1, 1958, providing for continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides, fungicides, and other pesticides, upon fish and wildlife for the purpose of preventing losses of those invaluable natural resources and for other purposes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act."

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill S. 1575 and to insert the language of the bill H.R. 5813, which has just passed the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DINGELL: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: That section 2 of the Act of August 1, 1958, providing for continuing studies of the effects of insecticides, herbicides, fungicides, and other pesticides, upon fish and wildlife for the purpose of preventing losses of those invaluable natural resources and for other purposes is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 2. The sum of $2,565,000 per annum is hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the objectives of this Act.' "

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill (H.R. 5813) was laid on the table.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STATE TAXATION OF INCOME FROM INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2524) relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and establishing a Commission on State Taxation of Interstate Commerce and Interstate and Inter-governmental Taxation Problems, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

NO COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is a very far-reaching one, and I cannot understand why we should pass a bill that goes as far as this goes without giving it thorough consideration in committee. We should be absolutely sure that we are proposing the right kind of a law to deal with the situation confronting us. The only way I know to be absolutely certain that a proposal is right and should be adopted is to have full and complete hearings before the committee having jurisdiction. It is possible that such a hearing would show that this proposal is satisfactory. On the other hand, it is possible a hearing will disclose that it would be a mistake to pass this particular bill. My point is we do not have sufficient information to pass on this proposal for permanent legislation.

It is my understanding that the Committee on the Judiciary has not given consideration to this bill. I have a very high regard and great respect for the chairman of that great committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] and for the members of that committee, and what I shall say, I hope, is not construed in any way as a reflection on the committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, this bill involves a question of taxes. Now, last week when the question came up by the gentleman from Pennnsylvania [Mr. WALTER] presenting it here on the floor—and I reserved the right to object on the question of sending it to conference—it was then brought out that the bill was just a temporary bill; that it was not permanent legislation at all. And, I did not object to it because it was just temporary, and the fact that it had no hearings or not sufficient hearings—I did not have any objection to that, but it went ahead to conference. Now, when it goes to conference an entirely different bill is brought out; a Senate bill is brought out relating to taxes.

Now, if I understand anything about parliamentary procedure and the Constitution, questions affecting revenue, taxes, should originate in the House of Representatives and in the Committee on Ways and Means. This bill did not originate in the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. It originated in the other body, and having originated there and we agreeing to a conference and then agreeing to the Senate bill, it occurs to me that there is a serious question about its being in order. But, I am not raising that question. I am raising the question on the merits.

Mr. Speaker, I think this bill could be of great harm to the local independent hometown merchants. Like it is now, the hometown merchants are paying all the taxes to help sustain the local communities, and under the Supreme Court decisions hereafter the people who are doing an interstate business, and from the outside who come into the territory of this local merchant and take part of his business and part of his profits and make money on it will also have to pay a fair share of those profits to the local taxing authority. In other words, the hometown merchant will have the burden taken off of him to that extent. But, if this bill passes, the hometown merchant will have to continue to pay all the burden and the outside concern that rushes in and gets business away from the local merchant will pay no tax whatsoever on the profits of such business; just leave it to the hometown merchant to carry all the burdens.

Now, those questions should be looked into. I know that we should have uniform laws. I realize that there is almost consternation in at least a part of the business world by reason of these decisions of the Supreme Court and the action of the Supreme Court, and I realize there should be a uniformity of laws in the 50 States of the United States, but we cannot have uniform laws regarding taxes worked out by a committee that does not have jurisdiction over taxes. There is only one committee that has jurisdiction over taxes, and that is the Committee on Ways and Means, and without any disrespect to the distinguished gentleman from New York and the fine members of his committee composed of both political parties, I suggest that this bill should be taken up anew by the Committee on Ways and Means and efforts made to harmonize the different laws of the different States and have a bill that will be uniform throughout the States. I realize the opposition is at a great disadvantage in opposing this bill, under the circumstances, but I feel strongly about it and believe a mistake will be made if we pass it without proper and adequate committee consideration.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Is there objection to the request of the the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, I will be compelled to object, Mr. Speaker, if the regular order is demanded.

The SPEAKER. Then, the Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. If I do not object to the reading, that does not foreclose me from objecting to the consideration of the conference report?

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter. No objection lies.

Mr. PATMAN. No objection lies on this? The Speaker is talking about the reading?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is talking about the conference report, which is a privileged matter.

Mr. PATMAN. And one objection would not lie to it?

The SPEAKER. No objection would.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. Will we have a chance to debate it?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York yields time.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York whether he will yield me time to discuss this matter.

Mr. CELLER. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman in due course. But I want to say that his fears are utterly ungrounded.

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded and the regular order is the reading of the conference report.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection to the reading of the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1103)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2524) relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and establishing a Commission on State Taxation of Interstate Commerce and Interstate and Intergovernmental Taxation Problems, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"TITLE I—IMPOSITION OF MINIMUM STANDARD

"SEC. 101. (a) No State, or political subdivision thereof, shall have power to impose, for any taxable year ending after the date of the enactment of this Act, a net income tax on the income derived within such State by any person from interstate commerce if the only business activities within such State by or on behalf of such person during such taxable year are either, or both, of the following:

"(1) the solicitation of orders by such person, or his representative, in such State for sales of tangible personal property, which orders are sent outside the State for approval or rejection, and, if approved, are filled by shipment or delivery from a point outside the State; and

"(2) the solicitation of orders by such person, or his representative, in such State in the name of or for the benefit of a prospective customer of such person, if orders by such customer to such person to enable such customer to fill orders resulting from such solicitation are orders described in paragraph (1).

"(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to the imposition of a net income tax by any State, or political subdivision thereof, with respect to—

"(1) any corporation which is incorporated under the laws of such State; or

"(2) any individual who, under the laws of such State, if domiciled in, or a resident of, such State.

"(c) For purposes of subsection (a), a person shall not be considered to have engaged in business activities within a State during any taxable year merely by reason of sales in such State, or the solicitation of orders for sales in such State, of tangible personal property on behalf of such person by one or more independent contractors, or by reason of the maintenance of an office in such State by one or more independent contractors whose activities on behalf of such person in such State consist solely of making sales, or soliciting orders for sales, of tangible personal property.

"(d) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'independent contractor' means a commission agent, broker, or other independent contractor who is engaged in selling, or soliciting orders for the sale of, tangible personal property for more than one principal and who holds himself out as such in the regular course of his business activities; and

"(2) the term 'representative' does not include an independent contractor.

"SEC. 102. (a) No State, or political subdivision thereof, shall have power to assess, after the date of the enactment of this Act, any net income tax which was imposed by such State or political subdivision, as the case may be, for any taxable year ending on or before such date, on the income derived within such State by any person from interstate commerce, if the imposition of such tax for a taxable year ending after such date is prohibited by section 101.

"(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not be construed—

"(1) to invalidate the collection, on or before the date of the enactment of this Act, of any net income tax imposed for a taxable year ending on or before such date, or

"(2) to prohibit the collection, after the date of the enactment of this Act, of any net income tax which was assessed on or before such date for a taxable year ending on or before such date.

"SEC. 103. For purposes of this title, the term 'net income tax' means any tax imposed on, or measured by, net income.

"SEC. 104. If any provision of this title or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this title or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

"TITLE II—STUDY AND REPORT BY CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 201. The Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the U.S. Senate, acting separately or jointly, or both, or any duly authorized subcommittees thereof, shall make full and complete studies of all matters pertaining to the taxation by the States of income derived within the States from the conduct of business activities which are exclusively in furtherance of interstate commerce or which are a part of interstate commerce, for the purpose of recommending to the Congress proposed legislation providing uniform standards to be observed by the States in imposing income taxes on income so derived.

"SEC. 202. The Committees shall report to their respective Houses the results of such studies together with their proposals for legislation on or before July 1, 1962."

And the House agree to the same.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce, and authorizing studies by congressional committees of matters pertaining thereto."

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the Senate bill (S. 2524) relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and establishing a Commission on State Taxation of Interstate Commerce and Interstate and Intergovernmental Taxation Problems, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Both the House and Senate bills contain a minimum activities approach to the problem of State taxation of income from interstate commerce. It was the purpose of both Houses to specifically exempt from State taxation, income derived from interstate commerce where the only business activity within the State by the out-of-State company was solicitation. The bills, however, differ in the language used to accomplish this objective. The House conferees believe it is more appropriate to accept the language of title I of the Senate bill.

Unlike the House bill, the Senate bill contains no time limitation on the effectiveness of the immunity granted in the bill. The Senate bill also contains a more specific treatment of dealings through an independent contractor, by providing specifically that an out-of-State business shall not be considered to be conducting business activities within the State by reason of solicitation of orders or sales in that State by an independent contractor in its behalf. The conferees have inserted a clarifying amendment to this provision of the Senate bill, to assure that the maintenance of an office by such an independent contractor within the State shall not subject the out-of-State business to income taxation.

The Senate bill is limited to sales of and solicitation of orders for sales of tangible personal property. The House bill is not so limited.

The House bill contains no provision barring the assessment of taxes for years prior to the period of immunity specified in the bill, even though income derived from the same kind of activity could not be taxed during the period specified in the bill. Under the Senate bill, no State or political subdivision thereof may assess, after enactment of the bill, taxes for previous years which would be barred under the standard established in the bill.

Both the House and the Senate, recognizing the complexity of the issues involved, provided for a study of the entire problem with a view toward the enactment of appropriate legislation by the Congress. However, the Senate bill provided for an independent commission while the House bill provided that the study was to be made by Congress. The conferees concluded that the matter should remain with congressional committees. Consequently, the conferees recommend that the Committee of the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate shall undertake a study of State taxation of income derived from interstate commerce and shall report to the Congress the results of this study together with proposals for legislation by July 1, 1962. It is contemplated, of course, that the committees will consult with the States in this respect.

EMANUEL CELLER,
FRANCIS E. WALTER,
E. E. WILLIS,
WILLIAM M. MCCULLOCH,
WILLIAM E. MILLER,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, briefly, I want to state that this bill simply provides that the taxing State shall not be privileged to tax income from the solicitation of orders going to an out-of-State business.

It also provides for a study to be made by the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, jointly or separately. Those committees, jointly or separately, shall offer proposals for legislation by July 1, 1962.

The need for this legislation, briefly, stems from certain decisions of the Supreme Court which generated a fear that the mere solicitation of orders or sales in a taxing State by an out-of-State corporation would subject that out-of-State corporation to income taxes in the taxing State.

All this bill does is to say, on transactions of that sort, there shall be no State income taxes. If there is a warehouse or a stock of goods maintained by the out-of-State corporation in the taxing State, or the out-of-State corporation maintains an office in the taxing State, then there shall be taxation on the net income earned in the taxing State.

There were differences between the House bill and the Senate bill. The House bill had some exemptions which were broader than the Senate bill, but the House conferees accepted the narrower provisions of the Senate bill, namely, that the only exemption shall be the solicitation of orders.

It was also agreed that the Senate would yield to the House on the type of inquiry that was to be had.

The Senate bill provided for some sort of Hoover Commission to go into the ramifications and complexities of this subject of interstate taxation. Finally, after argument, they accepted our proposal that the study should be made by the committees, as I have indicated. I cannot overemphasize the need for this study, for this area is one which is entirely deserving of the phrase which Mr. Churchill coined in another context. The problem of State taxation as it affects interstate commerce has, indeed, become "a riddle wrapped in an enigma inside a mystery."

That is all there is to this bill; and I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will agree to the conference report.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the reason for the need of this legislation is important. As you will recall, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision which seemed to indicate a power to tax interstate commerce, which power did not exist, does not exist, and nobody has ever contended that that power did exist.

Subsequently two applications for writs of certiorari were denied by the Supreme Court in cases where the only activity was solicitation. The failure to grant certiorari in these cases caused concern on all sides, particularly in the small business area. There are people who are not in a position to maintain the large staffs that corporations doing business all over the United States generally employ. There came from these people a plea to the Congress to do something about this uncertain situation.

I might say to my distinguished friend from Texas that nobody is disposed to indicate what kind of taxes may or may not be levied. That is something that is not considered in this legislation. All we do is endeavor to convince the small business people in America that the law, as they thought it was prior to the denials of certiorari in the Brown Forman and International Shoe cases, is still the law.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] yield to me?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think the House should clearly understand it is most imperative not only that this legislation be enacted, but that it be enacted now. Contrary to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, this legislation is not broad in its effect. It is very narrow, indeed. It covers only the single and simple area where a corporation does nothing more within a State than solicit orders. If that is all the corporation does within the taxing State, simply soliciting orders, then under this bill they are exempt from multiple taxation. This is important to small business. Large corporations can afford the attorneys and the accountants necessary to keep books for the payment of some 34 different State taxes computed on 34 different State taxing provisions. But, small business engaged in interstate commerce who do nothing more, perhaps than solicit orders either by a salesman within a State or even just through the mail, have always thought that they would not be subject to multiple State taxation. That was always understood to be the law. It was always understood to be the law by the States themselves. They have never attempted to impose a State income tax on simply the soliciting of orders by a salesman within a State. Never has any State done that up to this time. But, because of the dictum in these Supreme Court decisions, there is some question now as to, perhaps, whether or not a State may from now on start such taxation.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of New York. Not at this moment—not until I finish my statement.

Mr. Speaker, as a consequence, it has placed small business in such a quandary as to make it almost impossible for them to know how to proceed. All this bill does is to restate what has always been presumed to be the law in connection with these operations in interstate commerce. In addition to that, all it does is to keep for the Congress itself, since there has already been an investigation in this field by the Senate Finance Committee, by the Senate Committee on Small Business, and since there has already been constituted a House Committee, a special subcommittee for the purpose of dealing with this proposition, it was only felt we should keep the further investigation and development of this proposition, because there are many facets which need investigation and study, including the respective rights of the States, including certain questions regarding warehousemen and interstate carriers, offices within a State and a hundred other things. But we simply have provided that investigation will be conducted and the results will be reported to the Congress not later than July 1, 1962.

As far as the other part of the bill is concerned, the affirmative legislation relates only to the narrow issue of soliciting orders and if it is not passed in this session, small business will be in such a chaotic condition that it will probably cause a tremendous diminishing of our business in interstate commerce.

Mr. CELLER. The question of interstate taxation is so complex and so replete with difficulties and mysteries, if I may use that term, that it would be well only to set up a minimal standard. That is all this bill does.

Mr. MILLER of New York. That is all it does.

Mr. CELLER. It sets up a minimal standard.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of New York. I do not have control of the time.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Will you give me 15 minutes?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein certain germane material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman if he needs it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

SMALL BUSINESS IS NOT ASKING FOR THIS PARTICULAR BILL

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the small business people are not asking for this particular law. Any argument that it helps the little man or the small man is not a valid argument. The small people have not been asking for this at all. But, I will tell you who has been asking for it, and they are well represented in Washington, D.C. Anything that happens in the Supreme Court or in Congress affecting their interest, they know whom to go to see and they can see them quickly. They know what to do. This bill will be a great advantage to interstate chains. It will be a great advantage to catalog houses. It will be of great advantage to people like that, but it will be a great harm and a disadvantage to the hometown merchants. Under the Supreme Court decision the local merchants paying all the local taxes to keep up the community will be relieved of part of those taxes where a law imposes taxes upon the outside concern only for the profits made in that community or in that area.

Remember, if you pass this bill, you will tell the hometown merchants that they must continue to assume all this burden, and the people on the outside of the State doing business in that community in competition with the local merchants will not have to pay any part of the taxes, although that person has taken part of the local merchant's business and the Supreme Court said he should pay a part of the profits to the local community just like the hometown merchant pays. But if you pass this bill the hometown merchant will have to continue to pay it all.

I do not know what should be done about this problem. I know something should be done but not done quickly. The Judiciary Committee has set up a special subcommittee to look into this very question. They are already organized. They have not put one witness on the stand, they have not had any testimony; and this proposal will be permanent law. Read it for yourself. This is permanent law, it is not just until 1961, it is forever.

This question of reporting by July 1, 1962, refers only to any additional proposals that might be desired; it does not refer to this permanent law. Can it be said that it is any compliment to the great House of Representatives, 437, Members, that we would take up a bill like this that means so much, and pass it as permanent law without even a committee hearing?

The hearings in the Senate—I looked them over; they are not satisfactory.

This is a far-reaching question, I tell you, and should not be settled by shooting from the hip or just guessing what should be done. There are so many objectionable features associated with the passage of this bill that I am convinced that it would be a mistake for Congress to vote for its enactment at this time.

Let me emphasize the nature of this measure. It affects millions of dollars of revenue being collected by the individual States; it affects the revenues of the Federal Government; it overrules existing law; it will have a definite impact upon the industries and commerce of the entire Nation. It will invalidate State laws.

VERY IMPORTANT BILL

I noticed that in the other body the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee advised his colleagues that the bill was one of the most important pieces of legislation which that body will consider this year. That was the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia, Senator BYRD. He tells you how important it is, but we are asked to pass it even without a subcommittee hearing, without any consideration of any kind whatsoever.

It seems to me, we are facing something anomalous here for despite the recognized importance of the measure under consideration, it develops that no hearings have been held by any committee of the House of Representatives on the bill. I say that today the House is not prepared to act on this measure because of inadequate information concerning its need and the consequences that may follow its enactment.

When the matter was first considered by the House about a week ago, we understood that we were voting upon temporary legislation—legislation that would expire in January of 1961. That situation has now been changed, for that which we are now being asked to approve is permanent legislation. Surely it is not unreasonable to ask that hearings be held upon a measure of this character before we are asked to vote its adoption.

This proposed legislation deals with taxes and income derived from interstate commerce. You cannot escape the fact that it has to do with the raising of revenue which fact was recognized in the other body because it was there considered by the Finance Committee. This measure, however, was first considered and voted upon in the other body and it was not until several days thereafter that the House of Representatives acted on this problem. S. 2524 did not originate in the House and has not been considered by the Ways and Means Committee. Is that in violation of the Constitution of the United States?

Is that in violation of the rules of this House?

It seems to me that in this field the first thing that Congress should attempt to bring about is the uniformity in the application of tax laws affecting interstate commerce, but this bill does not deal with this aspect of the problem. We are considering legislation affecting the power of the States to impose taxes on interstate corporations and if the Congress could enact legislation encouraging each of the States to apply this power uniformly, the principal need of those companies operating extensively in interstate commerce would be met. So I hope we can have more hearings on this bill in order that something can be done to remove any unnecessary burden which interstate companies are now experiencing in paying their income taxes to the States.

This matter is important to all businessmen in the United States—not merely those who represent large firms engaged in selling and shipping merchandise throughout the country. The small hometown merchants are in direct competition with many who are engaged in selling and shipping merchandise in interstate commerce. We should make sure that the hometown merchants in such situations do not have imposed upon them by the government of the State of their residence a tax which the same government is prevented from placing upon a direct competitor by act of the Congress of the United States. At the present time the tax burdens of the small locally owned merchants are shared with their interstate competitors. This measure would enable the interstate companies to avoid paying their share of such taxes. The bill, therefore, is detrimental and prejudicial to locally owned small business concerns.

Recently, the House Small Business Committee received a large amount of testimony and other evidence how these large nationwide firms are taking advantage of tax privileges and other "gimmicks" to destroy small businessmen who are doing business in only one locality in a State. We should take care to avoid adding to the burdens of small businessmen in that respect. For that and other obvious reasons, this tax bill, S. 2524, should receive the utmost and careful consideration by all Members of Congress. In doing that, we need the help and advice of our tax experts who are members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Without doubt, the two Supreme Court decisions evoked concern and unrest among those companies doing business in all 50 States of the Union because they feared that they would now be plagued with the burden of complying with income tax laws of 50 different States, many of which would require special records and differing methods of calculation, and so forth. I understand that there are 35 States at the present time that have corporate income tax laws and that 3 States, Idaho, Utah, and Tennessee, have amended their laws so as to be able to take advantage of the recent Supreme Court decisions. The passage of this bill will invalidate State laws in conflict with it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the interstate companies are entitled to legislation removing those onerous burdens that would stem from differing State tax laws and I believe that it is this problem which the Congress should first attempt to solve. Hearings must be held in order to accomplish this objective and it should be done as soon as possible. But the legislation before the House today merely provides that certain large companies doing business in many different States, may avoid sharing the tax burden presently borne by their locally owned, small business competitors, and I must oppose the bill because it makes it more difficult for the small locally owned merchant to compete against his large interstate competitor.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Members to seriously consider this matter. It is far reaching. What is proposed here is permanent legislation that has never been considered by a committee. The only way I know to reach it is to vote down this conference report and force the committee to have hearings on this proposal and bring in a bill after going to the Rules Committee to get a rule. This is not the right way to legislate on important matters like this that mean so much to the hometown merchants. We should not pass a law that could possibly discriminate against them.

A vote against this conference report is a vote for full and complete hearings before the proper committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for the conference report on the bill relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and to urge the Members of the House to support the report. If you will look at page 17770, you will see that the conference committee report was unanimously approved by the number of members thereof. I wish to associate myself with the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], of that committee, and my colleague, of that committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER].

I do not agree with the statement of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who is chairman of the Committee on Small Business, upon which I serve, when he says that this bill will be detrimental and prejudicial to small town local businessmen. There is nothing in this bill which will result in any injury to small town local businessmen. It is my studied judgment that this conference committee report when it becomes law, in effect will, in substance, restate that which we all thought was the law up until this time.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that the Congress of the United States would have been fully justified in writing much broader prohibitions in this field. I would have been pleased had section 3 of the original Senate bill, drafted by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance of the other body, been a part of this report. But, in view of the urgency of this matter, and in view of the thousands of communications that have come from small business all over America regarding the uncertainty that will result or is resulting from the Supreme Court decisions, it is particularly important that the Congress act before we adjourn.

This matter has been under study, if not by hearings in the Committee on the Judiciary, by many individual members of the committee and of the House. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House suggested that this matter be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House has urged that this matter be submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the House, and so has the ranking minority member of each of those committees so consented.

The conference report provides for a study by the Committee on Finance of the other body, and the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, either acting jointly or severally, or as subcommittees thereof, and to report on or before July 1, 1962. With all those provisions in the conference report, I want to say to the Members of the House that they can safely vote for the report and give not only small business—and I am particularly interested in small business—but big business, as well, the certainty that they need in their operations in interstate commerce.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], for whom I have great respect, has indicated fears which are more imaginary than real. This should not be a final bill. In other words, it is temporary in its nature because of the accompanying provision for a study. The study that we set up will reveal the ramifications and the complexities of State taxation of interstate commerce. The study will try to develop uniform State taxation formulas. Certainly, I say to the gentleman from Texas, one does not need extensive hearings to set up a bill that would provide primarily for a study.

I can assure the gentleman from Texas that I am just as solicitous of small business as he is, and I can say that this is not hurtful to small business.

We have had many, many communications from small business all over the country which clearly indicate to the contrary, that they want this legislation. And if that is the case, I cannot conceive how it would injure small business. We shall have hearings, and the gentleman from Texas will have ample opportunity to present his views before these committees that have been set up.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I received a number of letters from small business people who want this bill passed. Some of them will have to go out of business unless this bill is passed. In my hometown I have some 75 to 100 firms engaged in the granite business, and practically all of them will have to go out of business unless this bill is passed.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Tennessee points up very pointedly and very forcefully the great necessity for the immediate passage of this legislation. What the gentleman from Tennessee has admitted in effect is that never before that Supreme Court decision had the State of Tennessee levied any tax upon a corporation whose sole activity was that of soliciting orders within the State—never before. If they had, they would not need this new statute. So, because of this new Supreme Court decision many States now say, "Ah, now, apparently according to this decision for the first time in the history of our country, we can impose these artificial barriers, tariff barriers in each of the 48 States, to interstate commerce."

The answer to the question is legally that regardless whether this bill is passed or whether it is not, the Tennessee statute in my judgment would be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States as being an undue burden on interstate commerce. I do not think there is any question about that. But if each State could pass such a statute as they did in Tennessee, there is not a single businessman in all America who would know what he was doing, what taxes he owed, or to what State, or how much, or on what formula, or on what theory.

The purpose of this legislation is to make uniform, and to make a part of the statutory law, that which has always been considered to be the law, namely, that the mere solicitation of orders within a State by a corporation does not subject that corporation to a multiplicity of State taxation, namely, 48.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] said that small business was not interested in this legislation, that they did not want it.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I did not say that.

Mr. MILLER of New York. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. PATMAN. Small business was not asking for this bill.

Mr. MILLER of New York. All right, small business was not asking for this bill. I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas, being the chairman of the Select Committee on Small Business, has not been made aware of the fact that small business all over this country are pleading for this legislation, unless it is because small businessmen all over America have finally come to the conclusion that they cannot get any help from him because they certainly have written to every member of the special committee set up to study this question. We have received literally thousands of communications from small business asking for this tax relief. The gentleman from Texas was talking about tax revenues that the States would lose and that small businessmen within the State would have to absorb, if this were passed. I say to the Members of the House, no State ever received one dime of revenue from interstate business which is now made exempt under this law. It only clarifies and puts in statute form what has always been presumed to be the law both by officers of the Federal Government and by the respective States. This is not going to help the chain stores. Every chain store or every chain that has a store in any State will be subject to taxation by that State. This is simply a soliciting of orders bill, and is in the interest of small business and in the interest of eliminating confusion, it should be passed and passed immediately by this Congress.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITENER].

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this legislation for reasons exactly opposite those, apparently, of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. This legislation is necessary because of recent unfortunate decisions by the Supreme Court, which for the first time held that States were entitled to impose taxes upon business strictly and exclusively within interstate commerce notwithstanding that theretofore the Supreme Court had steadfastly held there must be some jurisdictional basis, as that term is generally understood by lawyers, to support taxation. When we go back to the case of Miller Brothers against Maryland where sales or use taxes were involved, the Supreme Court in 1954 held that Maryland could not impose such a tax where there was no jurisdictional basis such as a warehouse or some facility within the State of Maryland of this Delaware merchant.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] says he has no complaint from small business people. His experience in this matter differs from mine. I was one of the first to introduce a bill to correct these unfortunate decisions in the Stockham Valve case and in the Northwestern States Cement case—the Minnesota and Georgia cases.

In my particular district six of the seven counties border on other States, the State of South Carolina on the south and Tennessee on the north. Small business people in my district in the six counties carry on dry cleaning operations, independent wholesale grocery businesses, independent drug wholesaling, textile machinery parts, machine shops and other small concerns. They cross the State lines back and forth without any hesitancy whatsoever.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHITENER. Not at the moment.

Mr. Speaker, they are faced with the problem now of keeping numerous records. Many of them are small operations with the owner and, perhaps, his wife or his daughter trying to keep the multiplicity of records required of them.

There has been created an additional burden unless some legislative relief is given to them.

Let me say this about the conference report which we have before us. There are some features of this legislation that I do not feel meet the entire problem. This is, however, merely a temporary or stopgap measure, and we must do something now, I think, in the interest of the small businesses. Let me further say this. The big business people have not contacted me. It is the little business people who are concerned.

As far as my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], talking about the giant chainstores, they have been paying taxes upon the allocable part of their income derived from operations within the various States—the 35 States, which have income taxes, because there is an incontrovertible jurisdictional basis for such taxation. This act will not change that at all. I say this is needed legislation. If I were drawing the bill, I would draw it, as I did, and the one which was introduced by me earlier.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COHELAN. I wonder if our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina, can clarify this point for me. It is my understanding that the U.S. Supreme Court nearly 40 years ago in United States Glue Co. v. Oak Creek case (247 U.S. 321) held a State may impose a fairly apportioned net income tax on a foreign corporation whose business operations within the State are wholly of an interstate character.

Mr. WHITENER. I will say to the gentleman that no less an authority than Mr. Justice Frankfurter, and I would commend his dissenting opinion in the Stockham Valve case to the gentleman, says that this is not correct. There is a law review article in the Seventh Tulane Tax Institute Report that I have on my desk supporting the proposition that this was the first departure from the old rule that transactions exclusively within interstate commerce are not subject to State taxation unless there is a jurisdictional base. I might further point out to my friend that the case to which he refers involved a gross receipts tax. It is distinguishable from the Stockham and Northwestern cases.

Mr. COHELAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN].

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself to the bill under consideration from the point of view of the small businessman in whom so many of us on both sides of the aisle are interested.

When I practiced law back in Maine I represented a number of small firms, such as those manufacturing shoes, employing anywhere from 30 to 50 or 75 people. They can sell their product and make a profit only by going beyond the borders of the State, and when they make a good product they go into as many States as possible. They cannot afford elaborate sales organizations. They usually are represented by agents with several other principals. Without this legislation, such firms are in the position of keeping such records and incurring such burdens that it is extremely doubtful that many of them could continue to engage in this type of activity.

It seems to me, as the gentleman from New York has said, that this legislation is necessary as a stopgap. Refinements can be considered as this study continues, but without it many small firms, many small businessmen, not only in my State but all over the country, will be severely prejudiced, and I suspect a number of them will be driven out of business.

Mr. Speaker, I urge very emphatically that we undertake this minimum legislation. I think we owe it to many kinds of small business in all parts of this Nation. Not to pass this bill is to contemplate and acquiesce in a Balkanization of this country that this body is placed here to guard against. That is one of our primary functions.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that this conference report be adopted.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, joining the committee that is offering this legislation and urging approval of this legislation, may I say that at least 15 or 20 industries in my State, West Virginia—and I am thinking about the glass industry in particular—do business in 48 States of the continental United States. They are pleading for the passage of some kind of legislation that will offset the decision of the Supreme Court and break up this plan of the States assessing taxes on their activities in various States. I cannot think of any industry hurt as badly as the glass industry. We have been hurt severely by the competition of imports, likewise with the pottery industry and various other industries in my State.

I urge support of this legislation.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report as a Member who filed a similar piece of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill is not passed we will only open up the Pandora's box of uncertainty and chaos for businesses throughout the 50 States of the Union.

In regard to the statement of the gentleman from Texas that small business is against this bill, I have here in my hand letters from over a hundred small business concerns in Massachusetts which have written to me requesting that I do everything possible to see that this bill is passed.

For example, I read the following letter from the Valley Paper Co., of Holyoke, Mass., dated August 4, and addressed to me:

> Please refer to Senate Joint Resolution 113, S. 2213, and S. 2281 dealing with State taxation of income derived solely from interstate transactions.
> We desire to register our strong support of this proposed legislation and therefore urge your cooperation accordingly—which we believe to be in accordance with the views of thousands of business organizations, both large and small.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the chairman of the committee: First of all, does he feel that the States have jurisdiction to tax out-of-State corporations? And, assuming that they did have jurisdiction, what determines the proportion of the corporation's income subject to tax by the State?

Mr. CELLER. That is one of the questions that the study we are setting up will concentrate on. It is a very difficult question to decide. That is why we want this bill, so the Congress will have the results of the deliberations of Members of Congress with the Senate on this vexatious subject.

Mr. PATMAN. I am sure the gentleman did not intend to leave the impression that this is a study bill by a committee?

Mr. CELLER. Not at all.

Mr. PATMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact it has two titles and that the first title will be permanent law?

Mr. CELLER. As far as solicitation is concerned it is permanent, but only in the sense that if this study comes to the House and the result of this study shows that the laws should be changed with reference to solicitation, the recommendation will be made and the Congress will have the opportunity to change it. That is all there is to it. I still maintain that this is stopgap legislation. Beyond that we do not go.

Mr. PATMAN. But title I is permanent law?

Mr. CELLER. It is not permanent in the sense that the gentleman says it is. It is permanent in the sense I gave it to the gentleman. Changes will be recommended, if at all, by the study committee.

Mr. PATMAN. And new hearings will have to be held.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Representing a district bordering on the State of Minnesota, which taxes interstate commerce, I strongly support this bill.

This legislation is the minimum action that should be taken here and now by Congress if a situation of confusion and chaos is to be averted as between all the States of this Union. I want to commend the conference committee, and I have no doubt that the distinguished chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. CELLER, together with the members of his committee, will begin a study of this important problem at the earliest possible date to the end that reasonable and permanent legislation may be enacted.

I thank the gentleman from New York for yielding to me for this brief statement.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support S. 2524. By limiting taxation on mere solicitation of interstate business, this bill gives greater certainty to the law on State taxation of such business. This is a great improvement.

By setting up a commission to study this whole problem, as provided in this legislation, we will take a great step forward because we will insure a careful overall examination, and we will guarantee a well-considered recommendation for a further law to eliminate in detail any unfair tax restrictions on business between the States.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on S. 2524, prohibiting States from imposing net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and recommending that the House Judiciary Committee and the Senate Finance Committee undertake a study of State taxation of income derived from interstate commerce, and make a report of the studies and recommendation for legislation to Congress by July 1, 1962.

This is stopgap legislation resulting from the Supreme Court decision in the Stockham Valves case. Some charges have been made that this legislation will hurt small business. The many letters I have received from business firms in my congressional district would indicate that these businesses would be hurt if this legislation is not enacted. If there are any inequities in the stopgap legislation before us, they will be corrected during the study to be made by the House Judiciary Committee and Senate Finance Committee and new recommendations will come back to Congress in less than 2 years.

Mr. Speaker, businessmen have been in a quandary regarding this matter since the Supreme Court decision was rendered. This type of business resulting from solicitation in a State with the orders to be filled by shipment from a point outside a State has not been subject to taxation by States in the past. I know that there has been pressure exerted by State comptrollers and State taxing authorities to kill this legislation, but we are not taking anything from the States. The States have never taxed the net income from this type of business.

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to include two of the many letters I have received from businessmen indicating the feeling of the business community on the Supreme Court decision and the need of this legislation which I hope will pass the House this afternoon.

GARDNER-BROOKS, INC.,
Springfield, Mass., July 16, 1959.

The Honorable EDWARD P. BOLAND,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. BOLAND: We at Gardner-Brooks, Inc., and most informed folks with whom I have discussed the matter feel very confident that some Federal legislation is urgently needed to prohibit any State from taxing businesses engaged in interstate commerce except when such firms have a permanent place of business within that State's borders.

We believe that the unrestricted flow of interstate commerce has been a major factor in making our country strong.

A multiplicity of State income taxes with varying formulas levied by every State in which goods are sold or to which goods are shipped, with the myriad of problems, obstacles, and costs incident thereto, could pyramid the costs of doing interstate business and the cost of living to the public.

We believe that the effect of such a taxation problem could have even more adverse effects on domestic business growth than were individual States permitted by the Constitution to levy tariffs on interstate shipments.

We believe that current active congressional interest in this newly arisen problem will be most constructive.

Sincerely yours,

J. LORING BROOKS,
President.

UNITED ELASTIC CORP.,
Easthampton, Mass., May 8, 1959.

The Honorable EDWARD P. BOLAND,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BOLAND: The United Elastic Corp., a Massachusetts corporation with plants located in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Virginia, doing an interstate business of $25 million annually, urges immediate Federal legislative action to clarify the recent Supreme Court decision upholding tax of corporations in interstate commerce.

In our opinion the Supreme Court by its decision did not uphold the intent nor the letter of the first article of the Constitution of the United States which limits the powers of the States to tax or impose duties on articles exported from any State.

We feel that the Supreme Court by its decision opens the floodgate for individual States to impose taxes on income that has been previously taxed. In addition the decision forces on all corporations and individuals doing interstate business the additional burden of keeping books and records, making returns, applying numerous formulas for the allocation of income in compliance with the varied laws of the 49 States. All this imposes a tremendous burden on corporations doing interstate commerce business.

We, therefore, urge immediate Federal legislative action for the purpose of clarifying the recent Supreme Court decision regarding State taxation of interstate commerce.

Respectfully yours,

H. W. CONANT,
President.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN), there were—ayes 130, noes 28.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 359, nays 31, not voting 45, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission granted I would further like to clarify a point with respect to the bill S. 2524, as passed by the House and Senate. It is not the intention of this legislation, in my opinion, that goods shipped into a State and temporarily at rest in a public warehouse should be singled out as a basis for the levying of a State tax against the shipper or manufacturer.

Mrs. WEIS. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased that the conference report on S. 2524 is being called up for consideration today, and I think the members of the Judiciary Committee are to be especially commended for the dispatch with which they have moved in seeking a solution to this vexatious problem of State taxation of interstate commerce.

In the past, interstate commerce has been at least relatively free from the burdens of multiple State taxation. As a result of the court decisions in the Stockham Valve case and in the Northwestern States Cement case, however, the door may now be open for any State to step in and impose crushing taxes on firms located outside, but doing business within, the boundaries of that State.

The burden of such taxation would be especially severe for the small-business man, whose volume of business in any one State would probably not even warrant continuing to do business in States imposing such taxes.

In fact, several firms in my own 38th District of New York have indicated to me that their volume of business in some States would be such that they probably could not even afford the administrative costs connected with keeping the voluminous records necessary to pay the taxes, let alone the taxes themselves.

Just this week, I have received word that 70 percent of the gross sales, both wholesale and retail, of the companies in Newark, N.Y., are made in interstate commerce throughout the entire country. Newark is the largest city in Wayne County, N.Y., which I am privileged to represent in the Congress, and it would be a fearful blow to the community's economy if crushing income taxes were suddenly imposed by a number of States in which Newark's business firms are operating.

S. 2524 deals with a portion of the problem by prohibiting States from taxing income derived solely from the solicitation of orders within a given State by out-of-State companies. The language of the bill itself makes it clear that this is not the final answer to the entire problem by providing for continued study by two separate committees of the Congress. But it definitely represents a step in the right direction, a step which is of vital importance to every businessman operating in interstate commerce.

Mr. Speaker, the absence of artificial trade barriers between the States has been responsible for much of the dynamic growth of this Nation, and the Congress has a grave responsibility to see that these channels of trade remain free and open. S. 2524 will serve the best interests of thousands of small-business men throughout the country, and I urge adoption of this conference report.

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1960, H.R. 8575

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD], I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House have until midnight to file a conference report on the military construction appropriation bill for 1960, namely, H.R. 8575.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AMENDING COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934 WITH RESPECT TO EQUAL-TIME PROVISIONS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2424) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to provide that the equal-time provisions with respect to candidates for public office shall not apply to news and other similar programs, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 1069)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2424) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to provide that the equal-time provisions with respect to candidates for public office shall not apply to news and other similar programs, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "That section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following sentences: 'Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any—

"'(1) bona fide newscast,

"'(2) bona fide news interview,

"'(3) bona fide news documentary (if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary), or

"'(4) on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection. Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this Act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.'

"SEC. 2. (a) The Congress declares its intention to reexamine from time to time the amendment to section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934 made by the first section of this Act, to ascertain whether such amendment has proved to be effective and practicable.

"(b) To assist the Congress in making its reexaminations of such amendment, the Federal Communications Commission shall include in each annual report it makes to Congress a statement setting forth (1) the information and data used by it in determining questions arising from or connected with such amendment, and (2) such recommendations as it deems necessary in the public interest."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2424) to amend the Communications Act of 1934, in order to provide that the equal-time provisions with respect to candidates for public office shall not apply to news and other similar programs, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934 now provides that if any radio or television licensee permits any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, such licensee must afford equal opportunities to all other candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station.

The bill (S. 2424) as passed by the Senate would have added to section 315(a) a sentence as follows: "Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any newscast, news interview, news documentary, on-the-spot coverage of news events, shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection, but nothing in this sentence shall be construed as changing the basic intent of Congress with respect to the provisions of this Act, which recognizes that television and radio frequencies are in the public domain, that the license to operate in such frequencies requires operation in the public interest, and that in newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, on-the-spot coverage of news events, all sides of public controversies shall be given as fair an opportunity to be heard as is practically possible."

In addition, the bill, as it passed the Senate, contained a section 2, declaring the intent of Congress to reexamine the amendment above referred to at or before the end of the 3-year period immediately following the enactment of this proposed legislation, to ascertain whether the amendment was effective and practicable. It also included a section 3 to require the Federal Communications Commission to report to Congress annually, during such 3-year period, certain information to aid the Congress in its reexamination of the effectiveness and practicability of the amendment being made to section 315(a).

The House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserted a substitute which merely amended section 315(a) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence, as follows: "Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any bona fide newscast (including news interviews) or on any on-the-spot coverage of news events (including, but not limited to, political conventions and activities incidental thereto), where the appearance of the candidate on such newscast, interview, or in connection with such coverage is incidental to the presentation of news, shall not be deemed to be use of broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection."

The differences between the substitute passed by the House and the substitute agreed to in conference are as follows:

THE AMENDMENT TO SECTION 315(A)

The first section of the conference substitute adds to section 315(a) a new sentence having the same general purpose as the new sentence proposed by the House substitute. However, there are differences which represent compromises between the Senate and House positions on certain points.

Under the House provision an appearance would have been exempted from the equal time requirement only "where the appearance of the candidate on such newscast, interview, or in connection with such coverage is incidential to the presentation of news." The Senate provision contained no language comparable to this, and it is omitted from the conference substitute, except as explained below.

The Senate bill exempted an appearance on a "news interview," while the House amendment exempted such an appearance only when it was included as part of a bona fide newscast. In the conference substitute an appearance on a "bona fide news interview" is exempted without regard to whether it is included as a part of a newscast.

The intention of the committee of conference is that in order to be considered "bona fide" a news interview must be a regularly scheduled program.

It is intended that in order for a news interview to be considered "bona fide" the content and format thereof, and the participants, must be determined by the licensee in the case of a news interview originating with the licensee of a station and by the network in the case of a news interview originating with a network; and the determination must have been made by the station or network, as the case may be, in the exercise of its "bona fide" news judgment and not for the political advantage of the candidate for public office.

The Senate bill exempted appearances of candidates on news documentaries. The House amendment made no such exemption. Under the conference substitute, the appearance of a candidate on a news documentary is exempted only if such appearance is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary. Thus, a program which deals predominantly with a candidate would not be a news documentary exempted under provisions of the substitute.

In the conference substitute, in referring to on-the-spot coverage of news events, the expression "bona fide news events" instead of "news events" is used to emphasize the intention to limit the exemptions from the equal time requirement to cases where the appearance of a candidate is not designed to serve the political advantage of that candidate.

The Senate bill, in the sentence being added to section 315(a), contained the following language: "but nothing in this sentence shall be construed as changing the basic intent of Congress with respect to the provisions of this Act, which recognizes that television and radio frequencies are in the public domain, that the license to operate in such frequencies requires operation in the public interest, and that in newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, on-the-spot coverage of news events, all sides of public controversies shall be given as fair an opportunity to be heard as is practically possible."

With certain modifications this language has been included in the conference substitute as a sentence reading as follows: "Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

The conferees feel that there is nothing in this language which is inconsistent with the House substitute. It is a restatement of the basic policy of the "standard of fairness" which is imposed on broadcasters under the Communications Act of 1934.

Section 2(a) of the Senate bill declared the intention of Congress to reexamine, on or before the expiration of a 3-year period, the amendment made by the bill to section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, to ascertain whether the amendment had proved to be effective and practicable. Subsection (b) of section 2 required the Federal Communications Commission to report to Congress annually during such 3-year period on the administration of the amendment, together with recommendations. The House amendment contained no similar provisions.

Section 2 of the substitute agreed to in conference is similar to these Senate provisions, except that the 3-year limitation has been removed.

OREN HARRIS,
WALTER ROGERS,
JOHN J. FLYNT, Jr.,
JOHN B. BENNETT,
(By J. ARTHUR YOUNGER),
J. ARTHUR YOUNGER,
WM. H. AVERY,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we bring to the House a conference report on legislation which is commonly referred to as the equal-time amendment to the Communications Act of 1934.

It will be remembered that this is the problem we had in the House a few days ago in which all of us are interested and have some concern about.

You will recall that this problem developed out of a decision of the Federal Communications Commission—which we thought was a rather arbitrary decision—in the Lar Daly case involving the appearance of political candidates on newscasts.

We made an effort to clarify section 315 by exempting from the equal-time provision political candidates' appearance on such programs as newscasts, news interviews, and on-the-spot coverage of news events.

Your conferees met and there was considerable discussion. It would be correct to say that at times it got a little heated. But we have done the best we could to resolve this issue and bring it back and present it to you in an effort to clarify this very important provision of law.

We tried to limit carefully the exemptions from section 315 in the bill which we brought to the House. We exempted bona fide newscasts which had been the pattern over the years. We included in connection therewith news interviews and we extended the exemption to on-the-spot coverage of news events using the language of the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss], as he offered it at that time requiring that the appearance of the candidate must be "incidental to the presentation of news."

We described what was intended. We explained that it was difficult to write specific language to meet the problem, but we were making legislative history in the report and on the floor which the industry and the Federal Communications Commission could follow in trying to administer this very knotty problem.

We had little trouble in agreeing on what was intended during the course of the debate except in one instance, and that had to do with certain so-called panel discussions. It will be recalled that the committee struck the words "panel discussion" and "news documentary," but we were careful to explain in the report and in our debates here on the floor of the House that we struck those words because the committee felt these undefined categories might take in too much, and that the exemption thus would possibly go too far; but we also explained that by doing so we did not intend to eliminate those panel discussions and news documentaries which may fall in the category of a "bona fide newscast" or of an "on-the-spot coverage of news events."

As I say, during the course of the debate a question was asked by one member of the committee, Mr. YOUNGER, of another member of the committee, Mr. Moss, as to his intention with respect to certain panel shows. The gentleman from California [Mr. Moss] gave him his reply, which in my opinion, was contrary to what we had included in the report, and which certainly was contrary to what I had said in answer to a question by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD]. Now that, as well as some other things, had to be resolved, so in our conference we agreed that the language would be changed.

And, I might say, in my opinion, we have got a better bill in this conference report than we had in the bill which was reported by our committee and passed in the House and a better bill than was passed by the other body.

So, what we did was to exempt the appearance of a legally qualified candidate on, first, a bona fide newscast—it has to be a bona fide newscast; second, a bona fide news interview; third, a bona fide news documentary, if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary. In other words, if you go back and pick up documentary material out of the past and make it a part of a so-called news documentary, the appearance of the candidate must be incidental to the subject presented on such news documentary. That is what we did, and our conference report explains that intention.

There is no question about the on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events, which refers to matters such as a national political convention and so forth. We have tried here in the statement of managers to spell that out just as clearly as we possibly can what is intended.

Now, just in case anybody in the broadcasting industry or in the Federal Communications Commission, or even a candidate himself, should get the idea that "The reins are off; you can do what you want to," we have accepted in the conference substitute a provision similar to what was referred to as the Proxmire amendment in the other body. This provision says that nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving the broadcasters in connection with the presentation of news, news interviews, documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events from the obligation imposed upon them under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

Furthermore, in the statement of managers on page 4 you will find that it is the intention of the conferees that in order to be considered bona fide, a news interview must be a regular scheduled program. Now, there has been already some discussion that on these national panel programs or interview programs there has been no particular problem. The great problem is that on the local level a broadcaster might set up panel discussions or news interviews that are not regularly scheduled programs but which constitute an effort to take advantage of such a program to further the candidacy of some political candidate. That is not intended to be exempted and it is not permitted under this report—either the spirit of it or the language of it. Such program has to be, No. 1, bona fide, and No. 2, it has got to be a regularly scheduled program before it would come under the exemption provisions. Then we went further than that to be sure that there was no advantage taken by the broadcasting industry or anyone else and reaffirmed the "standard of fairness" established under the Communications Act. Anyone trying to take advantage, will be held accountable to the Federal Communications Commission for his action.

Mr. Speaker, I think the conferees have done a very good job under the circumstances and I urge the adoption of this conference report.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the ranking minority member and a member of the conference committee.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the gentleman in the remarks he has just made in explanation of this bill. We are legislating here in perhaps one of the most difficult areas concerning the Communications Act. I do not think it is possible to arrive at a completely satisfactory solution or one that will deal effectively with every single problem that arises in this area. But I think we have come up with a reasonably good solution, an entirely practical solution, recognizing the rights of candidates on the one hand and giving broadcasters the right to exercise their bona fide news judgment.

I feel very strongly that the conference substitute is superior to the legislation passed by the House.

As I stated in the discussion of this legislation on the floor of the House, I felt that the bill as reported to the full committee by our Subcommittee on Communications and Power was a very satisfactory bill. As a matter of fact the provisions of the conference substitute are very close to the provisions contained in the subcommittee bill. In the full committee, however, a new clause was added providing that the appearance of the candidate on a newscast, interview, or in connection with the coverage of a news event must be—and I quote—"incidental to the presentation of news."

I feel that this language would make the task of broadcasters and the FCC an impossible one and that even with the best intentions in the world neither broadcasters nor the Commission can meet the task of distinguishing between appearances which are incidental and appearances which are not incidental.

I am glad to see that the conference substitute omits this language because the majority of the conferees felt as I do, that this requirement would lead to even greater confusion than we have at present under the Lar Daly decision.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the conference report will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I might say that the conferees on both sides agreed to this conference report with the exception of one Member of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss], who did not agree with the conference report as presented. All other members of the Conference Committee, both House and Senate, agreed to and signed the report.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the conference report and should like to ask this question. Does not the gentleman believe that the conference report and the explanation made in it, actually make for a better bill than we went to conference with?

Mr. HARRIS. I just stated that a moment ago; I feel that way.

Mr. YOUNGER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to be associated with the gentleman from Arkansas who is now addressing the House in his remarks. Certainly the fact that the conferees were able to agree was a direct result of the leadership of the gentleman and his positive assertion of the position of the House while we were in conference.

I wondered, while the gentleman was in the well—I know this item is going to come up a little later—if he would not address himself to the proposition that the test of the standard of fairness still prevails in the basic act irrespective of any changes that we have made in section 315; and it applies not only to political candidates, but issues and editorializing by licensees as well.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman is eminently correct. He will remember as he was one of the conferees, that we discussed this particular item and everyone agreed that the standard of fairness must prevail, and applies to the programs which will be exempted from the equal-time requirement of section 315.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask this question. The term "bona fide news documentary" as contained in the report does not under any circumstances mean a panel discussion, is that correct?

Mr. HARRIS. No; a panel discussion might come under the heading "news interviews."

Mr. HEMPHILL. As I recollect, the Senate debate on this particular legislation removed "panel discussions."

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, but as I explained a moment ago in our conference report that is explained on page 4. The kind of interview the gentleman is talking about has got to be a regularly scheduled program, has got to be bona fide, and if such a panel discussion comes within that category, it is permitted.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That was the intention in the committee when we discussed panel discussions?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the gentleman is correct.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will look at the report, the statement of the managers on the part of the House, on page 4, because you have just heard about all of the safeguards built into this legislation. I want to show you that you have no safeguards. The restatement of the so-called Proxmire amendment is virtually meaningless, the statement that says that a rule of fairness must apply, a rule of fairness which can only be tested at the time the station's license comes up for renewal, and renewals which are handled routinely and where there have been no refusals to renew. It gives an opportunity to seek a remedy when the case is cold and forgotten. And if you are a defeated candidate it is of little comfort to know that you may have had a remedy.

Going halfway down on page 4 of the conference report, let us find out what we are doing because it is my considered judgment we are making a back door repeal of section 315, as it applies to the standard of fairness of equal times for candidates. If we open up first by removing the criteria of incidental appearance, incidental to the proper presentation of the news, the conferees were clearly inconsistent because they said this criteria was of no value, and yet they applied it to the matter of news documentaries. They say that the appearance on the documentary broadcast must clearly be incidental to the reporting of the documentary material. But that test of fairness is removed. Any newscast is exempted if it is regularly scheduled. What is a regular schedule? There is no definition. "I intend to schedule it, if I can continue to secure sponsorship for it" might be the attitude of a station. "We will give it a trial run of 3 weeks." Then, it is a regularly scheduled program and is exempt. With reference to bona fide newscasts or news interviews—stop thinking of "Face the Nation" and "Meet the Press." This becomes an issue in your local district over your local radio or TV station.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. I yield.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I just noticed in one of the national magazines that a former Governor of the State of California is going to have a political, a regular political broadcast program beginning in the next few weeks in which he attempts to comment and interview people in politics. Would there be any protection against this former Governor interviewing the candidates of his own faith?

Mr. MOSS. As to the test of good faith, and I am not a lawyer, but I say to any of my colleagues who are—you try to prove that that broadcast was undertaken in bad faith—and you cannot do it.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Then the answer is——

Mr. MOSS. The answer is that he would be clearly exempt under the provisions of this language. This is wide open to abuse. Let us see where else we have a remedy. If we apply this general rule of fairness in a news presentation of broadcast material. It says, if a program is a regular program under the control of the licensee—if it is a case of a local station or a network—if it is network originated, networks are not regulated. The argument will be offered that networks are licensees because they own radio or television stations. That is not true at all. Mutual Broadcasting owns no stations and yesterday three former officials were indicted for what? For taking $750,000 to set up a special news service to feed slanted news. In my view, you cannot leave to these unregulated organizations, the responsibility of determining whether or not the treatment you receive is fair, or for that matter whether the treatment received by your opponent is fair because he, at election time, has the same right to enter the homes of the American people and present his platform and his views as any of us sitting here as incumbents have. I am concerned that the rights of each of us be preserved. Those rights are not preserved if we repeal this, and that is what you are doing here, and we are not doing it in the language of the statute—we are doing it in the language of the report of the managers from the conference. If it had been included in the language amending the statute, it would have been clearly subject to a point of order, and I assure you I would have made that point of order. But we have expanded this by definition. A newscast now is any program regularly scheduled where you might interview. Yes, it might be a case of the regularly scheduled "This is Your Life." It might be any type of regularly scheduled program thought up by someone in your community. I am not saying that abuses would occur in a great many instances, but I say they could occur and it is our responsibility here to see that they do not. All that is necessary to overcome the very unwise Lar Daly decision is to make clear in the presentation of the news where the candidates' appearance is incidental to the presentation of that news that it is clearly exempted.

That takes us back to where we were before the Labor Day decision; so if we adopt this conference report we go back a very great way, because for 32 years this doctrine of equal time has existed. It was in the first Radio Act.

I say there has been no showing to justify this type of action. It is far too broad; it is opening up the way to abuse, and I think the record shows that some who enjoy privileges in this field have certainly failed to live up to their responsibilities. Again I cite the matter of the indictment yesterday of the three former Mutual Broadcasting officials.

I urge most sincerely that this House not approve this conference report.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Of course, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AVERY. I know the gentleman has very sincere convictions about this matter, because he and I have personally debated them in committee and otherwise over a period of months; but in the course of his remarks made this afternoon, I hope the gentleman will clarify his remarks when he says we have extended this to the point that we have repealed section 315. The gentleman should say "in his opinion" we may have done that. Here we have a conference report coming up signed by four Members of the other body and by five Members of this body, and that certainly was not the position that we took in the conference.

Mr. MOSS. I yielded to the gentleman for a question. Let me say I do not think any Member of the House felt that I was expressing other than my own opinion and my own conviction. I was the sole Member out of 10 who did not sign this conference report, and I have no apology for that whatsoever. I recognize the gentleman's sincerity and the gentleman from Kansas knows I am sincere when I say that the language in this report opens the door all the way.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further at that point?

Mr. MOSS. I yield further.

Mr. AVERY. Since the gentleman mentioned the events of yesterday involving former officials of the Mutual Broadcasting Co., he would not want to leave the impression with the House that the action taken on section 315 in any way affected the action by the Department of Justice yesterday involving those officials that were just mentioned.

Mr. MOSS. That is such a far-fetched idea that I would not even propose it to the House.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman brought it up in the course of his remarks.

Mr. MOSS. I think it is evidence of the fact that we do not control licenses or regulate in any way these networks.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this moment to inform the House, believe it or not, that we have agreed on a labor bill; and, may I add, all of the conferees survived.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. YOUNGER].

Mr. YOUNGER. I shall take only one minute. I would like to call the attention of the Members to the conference report. In my recollection, out of the 11 conferees 8 are very prominent attorneys. I am not a lawyer, but I want to assure the Members here that in the opinion of those eight very well-qualified attorneys we did not repeal section 315, but we did make it possible for the broadcasting companies to properly report political meetings, political conventions, and parts of the campaign coming up in the next year.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to start out by thanking the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for so graciously making available to me this 5 minutes. I know how dear time is on these conference reports, and I appreciate it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to subscribe wholeheartedly to the remarks made by the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss].

The gentleman from California said this conference substitute constitutes a repeal of the equal time provisions of section 315(a) of the Interstate Commerce Act. I want to subscribe to that and to repeat it, and to add to it that I think it not only repeals it but virtually completely repeals it and that it just about eliminates the requirement for fair play in those subtle instances of discrimination which are possible between candidates on a radio or television program. The equal time provisions of section 315 of the act would otherwise cover these interviews. The conference substitute gives a virtual exemption of the equal time provisions to panel shows and to programs of that sort. For further proof of that I refer you to the language which appears on page 1 of the conference report where the exemptions are given to bona fide newscasts, bona fide news interviews, and bona fide documentaries. This offers something which has never been in section 315 of the Federal Communications Act before.

I want to recall to the House the fact the amendment that was adopted by this House, and it was adopted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reflected the work and thought which was given to the bill by the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss]. He is the author and he is entitled to give the best and the most complete construction of that amendment which is before the House.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I want them to remember the House bill required the test that the appearance of the candidate be incidental to the presentation of news. The conference substitute merely requires that the broadcast be bona fide, with one exception, and that one exception is interesting—the question of bona fide news documentaries. In that sole instance the language incidental to the presentation of news is retained. Why should incidental to the presentation of news be important in documentaries if it is not important in the case of newscasts, interviews and other news presentations? The answer is that it is equally possible to utilize preferential treatment for a candidate in the instance where you have a newscast and a news interview as it is in the case of a documentary and the damage to a candidate must be fully as great.

Let me point out that bona fide is defined on page 4 to mean this: "A regularly scheduled program." A program may be regularly scheduled for 3 or 4 weeks or a week or for 7 successive days and immediately after the election it may vanish from the airways. Why? For want of a sponsor, or something of that sort.

In the interim there has been great damage to a candidate.

Then, again, "bona fide" is almost impossible of proof. The only way you can prove the absence of bona fideness and the only way an injured candidate can prevail under this section, and show absence of bona fideness by the producer or by the sponsor or by the show is by showing one of two things: a long pattern of preferential action.

Let me say it may be that this is an incumbent's bill. Possibly it is and it may not be.

I do not speak to the House today on the grounds of partisanship. I say that the right of a candidate to be heard and make his views known over the property of the American people, the radio and television spectrum, is too sacred a thing to be lost by the careless use of words or to be lost because this House failed to take the time to consider the semantics of the thing involved.

If we are to preserve democracy, if we are to preserve free elections in this country, if we are to preserve the rights of each and every candidate, ourselves and those who run against us, and those who run for other offices, we must reject this conference report and start anew.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, in the work that was done on this bill in committee, I know of no bill where more thought and care were given to a piece of legislation than this. May I say there were a great deal of differences which were ironed out in the committee, and there were also some disagreements that were carried over to the conference. But, I do believe that the conference committee did as good a job as it could. Any of you who have ever sat in on a conference between the House and the Senate know that you never get complete agreement between all of the parties to that conference. It just does not happen that way. It seems to me that the conference committee did about as good a job as could be done when you consider the differences that there were between what has been presented here by the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. Moss, and the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. DINGELL, and what has been presented by the chairman of this committee. There were things, may I say, done in the committee which I did not agree with myself. But, I voted for the bill as it finally came to the floor because I felt that it was the best that we could do at that time. And, I believe that the conference report, may I say to my colleagues, is the best that could be gotten for you to vote on. In any piece of legislation such as this, where there are so many controversies and objections, you are finally going to have to resolve on a compromise, and this is the best that can be had. Overall I believe that the bill as it was originally brought to the House was the best bill. On the other hand, I find no particular disagreement with the bill as it has been expanded, and I believe that I certainly, being placed in that position, recommend it to my colleague as a compromise which can be voted on today, and I think you can do it in good conscience.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the chairman a question or two if I may. Just exactly what did the conference committee mean by "a regularly scheduled program"?

Mr. HARRIS. It means a program that is regularly scheduled. Say every day at a certain time or every week at a certain time. The same connotation that is used on anything that would be considered regular in its operation.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I am sure the chairman is aware of this, that in television programs more and more they are having spectaculars that are programed only infrequently, rather sporadic scheduling. Let us say, for example, that a station or a network had a program called "Hear It Now," on which normally they carry documentaries. But, suppose 3 or 4 months prior to an election, instead of carrying a documentary, they carry "Hear It Now" with news interviews of a particular candidate. Now, does that come under the exemption?

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman knows, as we all know, that there are human elements involved with anything that we have in our lives, and we know when someone on a program as important as this tries to go beyond the spirit and the letter of the law and begins to abuse it, it is going to be detected immediately.

Then is when you have the response from the general public. This language is so clear as to what is intended here that whenever an abuse occurs, then that abuse should be reported to the Federal Communications Commission with a request for immediate action.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I respect the chairman's answer, and I know this is a very difficult field. I was in the radio business for many years myself. Actually, we got into trouble when the Federal Communications Commission tried to interpret a very vague general law, and I fear that we are asking for a continuation of this trouble. I like the theory of that which is incidental to news. That puts the burden right on the station manager, the licensee.

Mr. HARRIS. And so does this.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Well, I wonder if it does it as well as the incidental theory, because clearly under that which is incidental to news, we spell it out to the FCC and to the licensee that the burden is upon the licensee and the broadcaster to determine that which is incidental to news. Now, if we get into regularly scheduled programs, that is open to a great variety of interpretations, I respectfully suggest, because things can be regularly scheduled for a few months this year, and then for 2 years they may not be scheduled, and then may be revived again. Then, too, it lets you run all over the map on these news interview shows, which, personally, when I was in the broadcasting business, I always looked at very carefully, because almost every one of them had some political insinuation of some kind.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the gentleman that I respect his views because of the experience he has had with this industry, and I have a lot of admiration for him. I would say even though he has a great deal of familiarity with the actual operation of the program, I respectfully suggest that he is not familiar with the law and with the administration of it. As a matter of fact, heretofore when the Commission issued its rule in the famous Blondy decision, everything apparently moved along all right including news interviews, panel discussions, news documentaries, and so forth; but when the Commission arbitrarily reversed its own position in the Blondy case, that is when the matter got out of hand.

I will say to the gentleman that it is now the intention, and this report does give the Commission clear language as to how to proceed and a very clear guide as to how to carry out the program. And I would say that this is much better from the standpoint of operation in the public interest than what we have had heretofore.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will agree with the chairman that I am not a lawyer or a jurist, but I have had a lot of experience because a licensee actually has to watch his p's and q's or have his license revoked.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would refer the gentleman to page 4 of the report which I think should relieve him of any fear that he has regarding the responsibility. I think because of the intense interest in this it would be helpful for everyone to understand just what is intended here, not what I myself tell you from my own convictions or views or what the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss] might say as to his own convictions, but the composite views of the conferees as set out in this conference report and the explanation that goes with it, which is a part of the entire history of the program. I quote from page 4 of the report:

> It is intended that in order for a news interview to be considered "bona fide" the content and format thereof, and the participants, must be determined by the licensee in the case of a news interview originating with the licensee of a station and by the network in the case of a news interview originating with a network; and the determination must have been made by the station or network, as the case may be, in the exercise of its "bona fide" news judgment and not—> and not for the political advantage of the candidate for public office.

We could not make it any clearer, in my judgment.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I tremendously respect the conferees and the chairman of this committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN. I just wanted to add this. I think we had a better bill in the original version in the House.

Mr. HARRIS. I still feel that this clarifies it.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, I hope it was not the intent of the gentleman to leave the impression that under the Blondy decision panel-type shows were exempt from the requirements of section 315.

Mr. HARRIS. Not at all. But I want to say to the gentleman that if the decision in the Lar Daly case was carried to its conclusion, which would be expected, it would reach panel shows, it would reach documentary news programs, it would reach news interviews, it would reach political conventions which have heretofore been carried on TV ever since we have had TV. And, in order to overcome those problems and difficulties, something had to be done about it. We present this as the method of doing it with the restrictions and the limitations attached to it.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. I believe that I have tried to overcome the effect of the Lar Daly decision. As I understand it, and I believe I am right, it changed the Blondy decision in applying to the reporting of the news. That was the mischief wrought by that decision. We here now go to an exemption of the panel shows which were not included in the Blondy decision.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, actually the one major difference between what we have here and what we presented on the floor of the House with our explanation is that one question. The gentleman from California interpreted the language so that it would not permit panel interviews. I, along with other members of the committee, interpreted it so that it would. This conference makes it clear; if it is a regularly scheduled interview, it is permitted.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that several broadcasters have commenced endorsing candidates or slates of candidates for public office. It seems to me that an endorsement is in effect a violation of the spirit of the section because it gives the preferred or recommended candidate free time to the disadvantage of the candidates who are not considered for endorsement.

Now my question is this: Will this amendment in any way authorize a broadcaster to endorse a candidate or a slate of candidates for public office, thereby violating the spirit of this section by giving the preferred or recommended candidates the advantage of the endorsement and the free time that is involved in that endorsement?

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the gentleman that this matter of endorsing candidates over broadcasting facilites has just been brought to our attention. We have made some inquiry regarding it. I have only found two stations in the Nation. There may be others that have endorsed candidates over their facilities. One is in Connecticut, I believe, and there has been no problem there because I understand they let all other candidates have equal time in connection with their endorsement. The gentleman has one in his own district, I believe, that has engaged in this practice and has endorsed certain candidates. It is our thinking that this seems to be a clear abuse of the standard of fairness which is applied under the Communications Act itself unless fair opportunities are offered to the other candidates. I think that question ought to be presented to the Commission, and I think also our committee ought to study this problem of stations endorsing candidates.

Mr. VANIK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. FORAND. Let me add to what the gentleman from Arkansas has just said—he knows of two cases—may I say I know of a third case because they endorsed my opponent in the last election and I beat him by 40,000 votes.

Mr. HARRIS. Well, there is some experience for you. If we could have that kind of luck, I am for more of it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes to answer any questions.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the committee on the report that it has brought in. It does not go quite as far as I would like toward giving freedom of information over the radio and television such as is enjoyed by the press of the Nation, but I think all of us who do believe in the right of information and freedom of the press could also endorse and approve this bill which will at least permit the news to be presented to us over another media other than the newspapers of the country themselves. I again congratulate the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Moss, who is a member of our committee and who was a member of the conference committee on this legislation, and Mr. DINGELL, who is a member of our committee, have prepared and circulated among the Members of the House a letter criticizing the substitute agreed to by the committee of conference, and they urge that the House reject the conference report.

As I read the letter—and I have read it carefully—the principal criticism it makes is based on the omission from the conference substitute of language which was in the House amendment and which, in effect, provided that the exemption from section 315(a) proposed by this legislation in the case of appearance of a candidate on a newscast, news interview, or on-the-spot coverage of news events, would apply only if such appearance was "incidental to the presentation of news," and the substitution therefor of a requirement that a newscast or news interview, or a program presenting news events through on-the-spot coverage, must be a bona fide program of that type or character in order for the exemption to apply.

The letter alleges that this change replaces "the objective requirement of the Houses bill that the appearance be incidental to the reporting of the news with the subjective text that the newscast or news interview be bona fide." It states that the conference substitute provides for "a purely subjective text almost impossible of proof without either the showing of the grossest kind of favoritism or of a long pattern of preferential treatment by the broadcaster."

The letter then states that "by the time the injured candidate had borne the burden of proof required by the substitute the campaign would be long over."

The sum and substance of the contention seems to be that the political candidate who, under the provision as passed by the House, would have been able to complain to the Commission with some hope of success in obtaining equal time would not have such a remedy under the language of the conference substitute.

I do not agree with this. It is my view that the complaining candidate will be able to take the matter before the Commission for a prompt determination of the matter. The test to be applied under the conference substitute is by no means too subjective to permit this. Under the substitute agreed to in conference, the appearance of a candidate on a newscast or news interview will not be exempt from the equal time requirement unless the newscast or news interview is bona fide, and appearance of a candidate in on-the-spot coverage of news events is not to be exempt from the equal time requirement unless the program covers bona fide news events. This requirement regarding the bona fide nature of the newscast, news interview, or news events was not included without careful thought by the conference committee. It sets up a test which appropriately leaves reasonable latitude for the exercise of good faith news judgment on the part of broadcasters and networks. However, it is not intended that the exemption shall apply where such judgment is not exercised in good faith. For example, to state a rather extreme case, the exemption from section 315(a) would not apply where the program, although it may be contrived to have the appearance or give the impression of being a newscast, news interview, or on-the-spot coverage of news events, is not presented as such by the broadcaster or network in good faith, but in reality has for its purpose the promotion of the political fortunes of the candidate making an appearance thereon.

There is another point on which I would like to comment. The letter states that the language of the conference report "reveals its weakness" in that the test of "incidental to the presentation of news" is retained with respect to news documentaries but not to other forms of newscasting. On the contrary, there is ample justification for this special treatment of news documentaries. News documentaries were not exempt as a separate category under the House amendment, but they were under the Senate bill. The report of the House committee explained that the committee did not exempt news documentaries because some such programs might, to quote the language of the report, "go far beyond what is normally considered to be news." I feel that the limiting language in the conference substitute as to news documentaries, since such programs are named as a separate category, is appropriate to meet the point expressed in the report of the House committee. I do not think that there is a similar problem in the case of the other categories included in the conference substitute.

I note that the letter makes reference to "panel shows" in a number of places, apparently on the assumption that this is a category in the case of which appearances of candidates would be exempt from the equal time requirement.

This term is nowhere used in the conference substitute. I can only assume that the writers of the letter had reference to certain programs that would be in the category designated in the conference substitute as "news interviews." Certainly I do not agree that the term "news interview" as used in the conference report is broad enough to include all the types of panel shows or panel discussions that one's imagination might conjure up—and I hardly think that the writers of the letter had this in mind. It might be appropriate to refer at this point to a statement in the House committee report with respect to panel discussions. This statement explained that the House committee amendment did not include them because some programs in that category might go far beyond that is normally considered to be news. Panel discussions were not treated as a separate category in the Senate bill. I wish to make it clear, however, that there certainly is no intention in this legislation to deny exemption from section 315(a) in the case of an appearance on a panel discussion if, by reason of the nature and characteristics of the program, it falls within any of the four categories specified in the first sentence of the amendment agreed to in conference.

The letter at another place charges the conference substitute is a back door repeal of section 315(a) and an "invitation to the grossest kind of political favoritism" and that it gives "an unprecedented opportunity to political kingmaking." This is, in my opinion, a wholly unwarranted statement, with which I heartily disagree.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Moss), there were—ayes 142, noes 70.

So the conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members desiring to do so may extend their own remarks in the RECORD just prior to the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

CENTURY 21 EXPOSITION

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 8374) to amend Public Law 85–880, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1104)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8374) to amend Public Law 85–880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following: "That the first sentence of section 1 of the Act of September 2, 1958 (Public Law 85–880; 72 Stat. 1703), is hereby amended as follows:

"(a) After the phrase, 'World Science—Pan Pacific Exposition', insert 'now known as Century 21 Exposition'.

"(b) Strike '1961' and insert in lieu thereof '1961 and 1962'.

"SEC. 2. (a) Clause (5) of section 3 of said Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(5) incur such other expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, including but not limited to expenditures involved in the selection, purchase, rental, construction, and other acquisition of exhibits and materials and equipment therefor and the actual display thereof, and including but not limited to related expenditures for costs of transportation, insurance, installation, safekeeping, maintenance and operation, rental of space, and dismantling; and'.

"(b) Add a clause (7) to section 3 of said Act as follows:

"'(7) procure services as authorized by the Act of August 2, 1946 (5 U.S.C. 55a), but at rates for individuals not to exceed $50 per diem.'

"(c) Clause (3) of section 3 of said Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(3) erect such buildings and other structures as may be appropriate for the United States participation in the exposition on land (six and one-half acres or more and including land necessary for ingress and egress) conveyed to the United States in fee simple and free and clear of liens and encumberances, in consideration of the participation by the United States in the exposition, and without other consideration. In the design and construction of such buildings and other structures consideration, including consultation with the General Services Administration, shall be given to their utility for governmental purposes and needs after the close of the exposition.'

"SEC. 3. (a) Section 7 of said Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, to remain available until expended, not to exceed $12,500,000 to carry out the provisions of this Act, including participation in the exposition.'

"(b) Add a new section 8 to said Act, as follows:

"'SEC. 8. The functions authorized in this Act may be performed without regard to the prohibitions and limitations of the following laws: section 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529); section 3735, Revised Statutes (41 U.S.C. 13).'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8374) to amend Public Law 85-880, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The amendment of the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and substituted a new text. The committee of conference has agreed to a substitute for both the House bill and the Senate amendment. Except for a clerical change, the differences are noted below:

The House bill provided for the conveyance or lease of land to the United States. The Senate amendment provided for a conveyance in fee simple of 6½ acres or more including land necessary for ingress or egress. The Senate amendment also required that, in the construction of buildings and other structures, consideration be given to their utility for governmental purposes and needs after the close of the exposition. The conference substitute adopts the Senate version on this subject.

The House bill amended section 6 of Public Law 85-880 so as to provide for the disposal of property acquired or erected with funds provided pursuant to the act, in accordance with Federal laws relating to excess and surplus property. The Senate amendment struck out this provision. The conference substitute adopts the Senate version on this subject.

The House bill authorized the appropriation of no more than $12,500,000. The Senate amendment authorized the appropriation of such sums as might be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act. The conference substitute adopts the House version on this subject.

Both the House bill and the Senate amendment would waive the prohibitions and limitations of section 3735, Revised Statutes (41 U.S.C. 13) insofar as applicable to the functions authorized by Public Law 85-880. In addition, the Senate amendment would waive section 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended (31 U.S.C. 529). The conference substitute adopts the Senate version on this subject.

OVERTON BROOKS,
GEORGE P. MILLER,
OLIN E. TEAGUE,
JAMES G. FULTON,
GORDON L. MCDONOUGH,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, explaining the conference report briefly to the House I wish to say that this is the so-called Century 21 Exposition bill. The House passed a bill which was presented by the Science and Astronautics Committee. The Senate in its consideration of the bill struck out everything after the enacting clause and wrote a different bill.

There are two fundamental differences between the House and the Senate bills that were ironed out in conference. The first and important one was that the Senate bill did not provide for any definite amount to be spent on the exposition; it provided that such funds as necessary would be made available for that purpose. The House bill provided $12,500,000 for that purpose. The Senate in the conference agreed to tie the sum down to not exceeding $12,500,000, which was the stipulation in the House bill.

On the other hand, when it came to the matter of handling the property on which buildings might be erected for the exposition the House bill did not stipulate the amount of property which would be provided for that purpose. The Senate bill provides not less than 6½ acres and that full means of ingress and egress to this property must be provided. In addition to that the Senate bill wiped out the provision which would permit a lease instead of an actual fee simple title to be given to the United States. We agreed to this. The lease provisions were stricken out and the bill as now presented to you from the conferees requires fee simple title in the United States.

Those are the two fundamental differences in the bill.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. As a result of the conference there is still $12,500,000 for this exposition in Seattle, Wash. Is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. No; it is not to exceed $12,500,000. That was the amount the House bill provided.

Mr. GROSS. That is a good deal like writing salary limitations into some of the bills that have been going through recently: "Not to exceed $19,000"; but we see that all of them are appointed at $19,000. The gentleman, I suppose, anticipates that this $12,500,000 will be spent.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. That will depend on what action the Appropriations Committees of both Houses take.

Mr. GROSS. But the gentleman anticipates that $12,500,000 will be appropriated, does he not?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I have great admiration for the gentleman's ability to detect waste, but I believe that if the United States is going to participate in that fair, and the United States has said it wishes to, that we ought to have a presentable exhibit out there on the west coast that will reflect credit upon the greatest nation in the world; and I hope it will not take $12,500,000.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I want to say it is still too rich for my blood, and I am opposed to the conference report.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the conference committee.

Mr. FULTON. I would like to assure the House that this amount of money is in good correlation with the other fairs that have been financed through Federal funds from the very beginning, ever since the Chicago Fair of the 1890's. The committee has looked into this carefully. It seemed that this would be a good type of building that can be used afterward by the Federal Government if needed. It can be used after the fair is over, either for Federal Government purposes or for other purposes by the State or city.

We have tried to work out a bill that was tight to meet the requirements of both sides. I am glad to say I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] as well as the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] that this is a good conference report and one we have all participated in and one that the Department of Commerce through its General Counsel has approved.

On behalf of the administration I must say it is within the budget and approved by the administration.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa that I consider this much more restrictive than the language involving $12½ million that was put in the bill because that would be a target to shoot for. Now they have to justify every cent they are going to spend.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I may say further to the gentleman from Iowa we are in far better shape than we would have been had we adopted the Senate provision where there was no limit at all. This stipulates a limit.

Mr. FULTON. Under this legislation sent up by the administration it would have been an authorization and an appropriation without the necessity of going to the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. I am glad to advise the gentleman that my amendment concurred in by the other side has made this legislation require every cent to be appropriated by the House of Representatives Appropriations Committee, so that we have tried to give it every kind of safeguard and have the House look at it and see that this is the maximum and that they do not get the money handed to them. Is that not right?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I like all this hedging that is going on over the $12½ million. If the gentleman here thinks that $12½ million is too much, I suggest to him that he could very well have reduced it in conference or tried to reduce it in conference. I hope you will not belabor this issue. I was not able to get a rollcall vote before, but if you keep telling me that you are likely to spend the money, you may convince me you will spend $12½ million and I might still get the rollcall.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEASING OF COAL LANDS IN ALASKA

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 6939) to repeal the act of October 20, 1914 (38 Stat. 741), as amended (48 U.S.C., secs. 432–452), and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1116)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6939) to repeal the act of October 20, 1914 (38 Stat. 741), as amended (48 U.S.C., secs. 432–452), and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6939) to repeal the act of October 20, 1914 (38 Stat. 741), as amended (48 U.S.C., secs. 432–452), and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

The conference committee agreed to reject the Senate amendment to H.R. 6939 and thus to restore the bill to the form in which it passed the House. Under this agreement, 10,240 acres of public lands in Alaska will normally be the maximum that can be held under coal lease or permit by any one person, corporation, or association. The Senate amendment would have made this figure 20,480. Lessees and permittees will also be permitted to hold an additional 5,120 acres (instead of 10,240 acres, as proposed by the Senate) if special need therefor is shown. The acreage limitations in Alaska will, in other words, be identical with those in force elsewhere in the United States.

DR. CORNELIUS P. RHOADS

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the world of science, and indeed our Nation as a whole, have very recently suffered a great loss in the untimely death of Dr. Cornelius P. Rhoads. When he succumbed to a heart attack last August 14, Dr. Rhoads was just 61 years of age, and at the peak of his brilliant career as director of the Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research and scientific director of Memorial Center for Cancer and Allied Diseases in New York City. His outstanding contributions to cancer research should not go unrecognized by this body, which has itself long devoted much attention and effort to attaining the same goal that Dr. Rhoads stood for—victory over cancer.

Strangely enough, Dr. Rhoads, affectionately known as "Dusty" to his friends and associates, came rather late to the medical field to which he finally dedicated his life so completely. Not until 1939, when he joined the staff of Memorial Center, did he begin to turn his prodigious energies toward cancer. The next year, he became director of Memorial, and held that position for 10 years.

A profound change occurred in Dr. Rhoads' attitude toward medical research during the early 1940's, a change that has since been felt all over the United States and even beyond. During the Second War War, he served as chief of the medical service of the Army's Chemical Warfare Service. There he had the opportunity to observe the remarkable progress that can be achieved when scientists work together under pressure. As we all know, scientists are traditionally individualistic. Yet, during the war, many of them found that they could work together without risking any violation of their individual rights as scientists.

Dr. Rhoads became convinced that this approach could be applied to cancer research. He already believed that the problem of cancer could be solved through well-conceived, thorough, progressive research. His war experiences further convinced him that a concentrated frontial attack could speed this success. The way to do this, he decided, was to enlist scientists from a multitude of disciplines.

Dr. Rhoads was a crusader, and fortunately he was endowed with the ability to fire others with his enthusiasm and confidence. The 14-story Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research stands today as a witness to the inspiration of his leadership. Built with the contributions of Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., and others, it is often called, appropriately, the tower of hope. Dr. Rhoads became director of Sloan-Kettering in 1945, and in this capacity he exhibited great skill and discrimination in selecting exceptionally well-qualified research workers. He was able to offer them wise and generous support, all the necessary resources for conducting their work, and most important, great freedom and flexibility in their individual activities. He attracted outstanding scientists from many nations to Sloan-Kettering, and by the time he died, he had earned the deep respect of scientists in all parts of the world. Still, he was modest enough to say once, "All I can do is pick good men, give them opportunities, and help them keep pointed at the target."

As is the case with most people who try to introduce changes, Dr. Rhoads suffered considerable criticism during his lifetime. Many believed him impractical and impulsive. Some scoffed particularly at his belief that chemicals could be effective in treating cancer. But he refused to be discouraged. Today, chemotherapy research is a nationwide operation, heavily supported by the Federal Government, and widely considered to be our best hope for the future in controlling cancer. I know it must have been extremely gratifying for Dr. Rhoads to see this acceptance of his views.

When Dr. Rhoads was first attracted to the study of cancer some 15 years ago, we were barely on the threshold of what is now today's most concentrated medical effort, a determined worldwide struggle to understand and reduce one of mankind's most staggering disease problems. Because of the dedication of men like Dr. Rhoads, we have secured the progress that has been made so far against cancer. His life will continue to furnish inspiration to all of us who work to conquer cancer.

It gives me great satisfaction to know that the Congress has made and is making a lasting contribution in this work. I am happy and proud that the Congress has recognized that progress in cancer research, particularly the enormous progress made during the very period when Dr. Rhoads was exercising his vigorous leadership, has merited increasing support over the years. From year to year, to the degree that cancer research has expanded and the need has increased, Congress has increased its appropriations to the National Cancer Institute. In 1945, the appropriation was slighly less than $500,000. For the fiscal year 1960, it is $91,257,000. The availability of these funds has contributed significantly to the support of worthy scientists all over our Nation. Dr. Rhoads' own research institution has been a major recipient of National Cancer Institute grant funds. The present substance of cancer research, the progress we have witnessed in such areas as chemotherapy, virology, and cytology, fully justify our support. They also justify our faith that there will be other men with the vision, the courage, the imagination, and the determination of Dusty Rhoads to carry on in this struggle.

I think you will be as impressed as I was by what Dr. Warren Weaver, Sloan-Kettering's president of the board of trustees, said about Dr. Rhoads. He said:

> It is quite literally true that he worked himself to death. But this occurred in a great cause, and however tragic the immediate incident, this is a noble way to die.

GEN. MELVIN JOSEPH MAAS: A LIVING EXAMPLE OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include an article with reference to Gen. Melvin Joseph Maas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, an example of unexcelled courage, determination, and devotion to public service is given us by our former colleague, Gen. Melvin Maas, in this week's—September 5—issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

Some of us were privileged to know and to serve with Mel Maas, who, by his life, has demonstrated the fact that there is no real need for anyone to be discouraged, but should accept complacently the disappointments and misfortunes which, in some degree, come to all of us.

Often the printed stories of the accomplishments of those who have reached the top are colored, the virtues of the individuals magnified, his faults minimized. That is not true of the story to which reference is here made.

It was my privilege, not only to serve with our former colleague here in the House, but on several occasions to be a patient at the Naval Hospital when Maas was there.

Never have I seen him discouraged; never have I seen him lessen his efforts to render worthwhile service to others. My association with him—and it was comparatively brief and not at all intimate—was always a reminder that there was no excuse for discouragement, no reason ever to cease trying to accomplish something for humanity.

But read the story, for no matter how strenuous your previous efforts may have been, it will inspire you to greater accomplishments for the benefit of others.

By his life, his faithfulness, and his accomplishments, our former colleague has rendered a service greater to our people than that of any individual I have ever met.

The article follows:

DON'T PITY US HANDICAPPED

(By Melvin J. Maas, as told to Paul F. Healy)

The telephone rang in my room at the Bethesda Naval Hospital and when I answered I heard an old friend, Robert Copsey, a brigadier general in the Air Force Reserve, asking what I was doing there.

"Bob," I told him, "you remember how I always admired beautiful women. Well, now all women are beautiful."

Copsey got the point that I had gone blind—and that I was adjusting to my condition and no longer felt sorry for myself.

Since that day in September 1951, quite a number of people have seemed startled by my ability to take my blindness lightly. They express astonishment, too, that I continue to travel alone all over the world—in the last 7 years I have covered 600,000 miles, to Europe, Central America, all U.S. territories and every one of the States. This travel without any escort, human or canine, has been part of my job as chairman of the President's Committee on the Employment of the Physically Handicapped.

What the public doesn't seem to realize, I find, is how millions of severely handicapped persons have readjusted their lives and have the ability of playing a positive, productive part in society. In my own case, the fact that I could joke about my trouble was the first sign that my rehabilitation was getting under way. It was a most welcome sign, too, because when I first learned that I was doomed to darkness, I was terrified and afraid that I would never be able to make the transition to a strange new life.

My blindness occurred with little warning in the middle of a busy career. For 16 years I had been a Congressman from Minnesota, and for 10 of those years had served on the House Naval Affairs Committee. I had been a flier in both world wars, and after the end of World War II had been active as a brigadier general in the Marine Corps Reserve. Then, in July of 1950, just after the Korean war broke out, I was recalled to active duty in the Pentagon as chairman of a Defense Department committee assigned to draft an armed-forces-reserve reorganization bill.

While testifying for this bill during the summer of 1951, I developed a severe case of ulcers and on August 28 was admitted to the Bethesda Naval Hospital. That very day my eyes began to hemorrhage, and the sight of my right eye began to fail.

Two weeks later a Navy doctor sat down by my bed and said bluntly, "You're a marine and supposed to be able to take it, so we're laying it on the line—you're going to be completely blind, and in all probability it will be permanent."

I was stunned speechless. The doctor went on to explain that the blindness apparently had no connection with the ulcers and might have been caused by any one of a hundred things, including bombing injuries I had suffered on Okinawa in World War II. When the doctor left, my first feeling was one of desperation. I had terrible visions of sitting on a street corner, selling pencils or shoelaces. For two nights I lay in a cold sweat. I never actually contemplated suicide, but I was all too aware that I was in a room next to the one from which a depressed James V. Forrestal, former Secretary of Defense, had gone to his death through a window in 1949.

My two immediate worries were that my income would be cut off and that I would be rejected socially. For the first time in my life, at 53 years of age, I faced the prospect of being utterly useless. I was afraid that I would be unable to support my family and would be a burden to them as well. I wondered if my family might not be better off if I were dead and they had my life insurance.

This period of black depression might have clamped down on me for weeks or even months—but I was too busy. I was still working on that reorganization bill. I was on the telephone all day every weekday, discussing its progress with the Congressmen who were guiding it through the House.

On the third night my panic ended. I was able to summon up a philosophy that had helped me before. It is: If you are faced with a problem and can do anything about it, get busy and do it; if your problem is something you can't do anything about, then it is senseless to worry about it.

I began to wonder what I could do about my problem, and I began to experiment. I still had some sight in my left eye, but I wondered what life would be like when that was gone. One morning I kept my eyes tightly shut as I got out of bed; I went to the bathroom and showered, shaved, and brushed my teeth without peeking once. This test brought me profound relief. If I could do that much without any trouble, life couldn't be so bad.

My reevaluation of myself started. First I realized that I wouldn't be penniless, as I had imagined during the period of initial shock. Any officer in the Armed Forces who is retired for total disability gets 75 percent of the base pay of his retirement grade, and this is exempt from income tax. As it turned out, I had reached the rank of major general by the time I retired, and thus began drawing approximately $900 a month, tax-free Also, some years before I had bought an accident-insurance policy that brings me a substantial monthly income.

Meanwhile, the psychological readjustment with my wife, Kathy, and my four children was starting out well. Kathy set an example by treating me just right—with encouragement and adequate sympathy but without coddling or maudlin sentiment. One day she brought me a brochure which described the rehabilitation course at the Veterans' Administration Hospital at Hines, Ill. My religion—I am a Catholic—has taught me that if I had the will to take advantage of the compensations, God would give me the strength and confidence. The brochure said that upon completion of the Hines course a person should be able to do everything he could before he went blind except drive a car. The course lived up to its promise.

My training at Hines started in November, 1951, as soon as I was able to leave the naval hospital. And at Hines I found myself with 2,500 others—mostly Korean war veterans—in the same predicament as myself, but learning things which make it possible for them to lead an almost normal life. Their constant self-kidding was wonderful for the morale of all of us. The whole course was designed to give us confidence—to rid us of the fear that we might become social pariahs. Even the compulsory dancing class with the Red Cross girls had this aim, though it took me a while to appreciate it.

At the first of these dances, when a Red Cross girl asked me to dance, I tried to beg off with the old chestnut, "I broke my leg in China." She didn't back down but pulled me to my feet with the remark, "Oh, come on General. If you enjoy dancing, you close your eyes anyway."

After we had danced awhile, my partner asked me how I was getting along at Hines, and I admitted that I was having some trouble learning braille. "Just remember one thing," she quipped. "Confine your practicing to paper."

At Hines I soon acquired a state of mind which, I am convinced, is one of the most important mental aids to the handicapped. I learned to regard my existence as a continual challenge, full of the excitement of discovery. When I woke up in the morning, I asked myself, What new things can I learn today—things that I once thought could be done only with sight?

In fact, I sometimes tried to do more than the course permitted. That's how I came to drive a car. One January day my instructor took me on an assignment in an outlying neighborhood. He parked his car at an angle. When we returned, a heavy snow was falling. The car's wheels spun when we tried to back out, so I persuaded the instructor to get out and push while I took the wheel. I was able to back the car into the middle of the street. Then I couldn't resist shifting gears and driving forward a short distance. The instructor got back behind the steering wheel with a memorable sigh of relief.

The Hines brochure had not bothered to rule out flying an airplane, and I had never heard of anyone literally flying blind. Yet, one time when I was returning from Hines to Washington, D.C., in a Marine Corps transport plane, I suddenly got the urge to take the controls again. After all, I had logged between 8,000 and 9,000 hours as a Marine pilot, and some of those hours had been fairly exciting. In fact, one of them had been downright stupid. That was back in 1931 when some of my colleagues in the House of Representatives scoffed at my motion that an enemy plane could get close enough to bomb the Capitol. To show them, I borrowed an old pursuit plane from nearby Bolling Field and made three screaming runs on the skylight of the House while it was in session. Members told me later the vibrations shook some plaster from the ceiling—and emptied the House in record time. Foolish though this stunt was, it proved my point.

Well, on this trip back to Washington in 1952, I asked the pilot, whom I knew well, to let me take his seat. He yielded, and I enjoyed myself thoroughly. After about 10 minutes the copilot leaned over and said respectfully, "General, you've made a 90-degree turn to the right." Following the usual procedure, I twisted the controls over to the left and held them there for 15 seconds to compensate. I said, "Well, son, how's that?" He replied, "Fine, General, except that you've made a 150-degree correction."

When I returned to the cabin, I sat with a group of young Marines hitchhiking a ride back to the capital. I said, "Boys, you don't know it, but you've just been piloted by the blindest blind pilot in the business." They laughed and one of them spoke up.

"But, General," he said, "you were doing swell—especially on that 360° turn." This was interesting news. The copilot, a first lieutenant, apparently had been too shy to tell a blind general that he was flying in circles.

So I gave up flying. But I have never given up reviewing parades. At first it seemed silly, but now it seems perfectly natural I can enjoy the music, and my memory of thousands of other parades helps me to visualize the scene. In fact, with someone giving me a description of what's passing—and nudging me when to salute the flag—I can practically see the whole thing.

Despite my blindness, I was kept on active duty at the Pentagon until August 1, 1952, because my advice was needed on technical amendments to the Reserve bill before it finally passed the Senate. During the next 3 years I was recalled to active duty to serve in full uniform at meetings of the Reserve Forces Policy Board, of which I was a member. Also, I served intermittently on active duty as a member of promotion boards in the Marine Corps.

One day an Army general remarked that I was probably the only general in history to remain on active duty while blind. "Oh, no, General," I said, "only the first to admit it."

When the President's Committee on the Employment of the Physically Handicapped was created in 1947, President Truman had appointed me as a member, presumably to represent the military Reserves. In April 1954 President Eisenhower asked me to step up to the job of chairman. I tried to convince the President that a sighted person could do a better job than I could. But I lost this argument with Ike, who had been a friend of mine since he was an Army major assigned to the War Department.

Our committee does not find specific jobs for the disabled. Its purpose is to educate employers in the practical advantages of hiring the handicapped. Our program is carried on through radio and television programs donated by industry, free advertising and newspaper space, job-opportunity tips channeled through the AFL–CIO, consultation with State and local governments, and many other ways.

The committee has 15 salaried workers plus its noncompensated chairman and 300 committee members representing civic, fraternal, labor, veterans' and other national groups. Mine is primarily a public-relations job. I give three or four speeches a week before all types of luncheon and dinner meetings.

Almost all my trips are by air, and I am usually met at the airport by members of the group I am scheduled to address. My first European trip after becoming blind was in 1953. After attending an international veterans' rehabilitation conference at The Hague, I went on to Paris to take up a military matter with my boyhood friend, Gen. Alfred Gruenther, then supreme commander of NATO and now president of the American Red Cross. After chatting with me for a while, Gruenther asked, "Who's with you, Mel?"

"No one," I said.

"No one?" he echoed. From the tone of his voice I could tell that he didn't believe me. So I explained that on my first trip as a blind man an escort had come along, but had become so airsick that I had to take care of the escort. After that I had decided to go it alone.

Only once has there been a serious mixup in my solo travel arrangments. In December 1957, I flew to Guatemala City to address an Inter-American conference. I had been told the reception committee would include quite a number of lovely young ladies. But no one at all was there to greet me at the bottom of the ramp. I followed the other passengers into the terminal by the sound of their heels—but still no one welcomed me. For the first and only time in my foreign travels, I felt keenly my total ignorance of foreign languages.

After standing around helplessly, I recalled the name of the hotel I was booked into, and desperately began calling out, "San Carlos Hotel. San Carlos Hotel." Nothing happened. People must have thought I was a barker for the hotel. After a half hour, however, a perceptive taxi driver took pity on me and delivered me to the San Carlos. There my hosts explained the mixup—I had not been expected until the next day.

In the United States if no one meets me at the airport, I ask a skycap to get me a taxi. The taxi driver, the hotel doorman and the bellhops take over from there. When the bellhop shows me to my room I ask him to take me completely around it, identifying each piece of furniture. When he leaves the room, I feel my way around the walls again. After that it's just as if I could see the room.

When I travel, my schedule usually puts me in a different city every day. Early one morning I woke up and couldn't remember where the bathroom was in the room I was occupying. Then I realized I didn't even know what city I was in. Having no alternative, I called the switchboard operator and timidly asked her where I was. Before she told me I was in Cleveland, Ohio, I could overhear her turn to another operator and say, "Boy, has this guy been on a bender."

One of the first problems I faced in traveling was that the hotel maid invariably put my bedroom slippers some place where it was almost impossible for me to find them. Now, before I leave my room I make a point of hiding my slippers from the maid—usually in a dresser drawer—before she can hide them from me.

Like other physically handicapped persons who get around, I find that the biggest hazard is the well-meaning but thoughtless person who is determined to help me. It seems to be a natural inclination to grab a blind person by the arm and shove him along. But if I'm shoved out in front of a sighted person, it means I come to the curb first, or I am pushed into revolving doors ahead of him. However, if he lets me take his arm, then I'm a half step behind him and can tell by the feel of his arm anything he's about to do, such as turning or going downstairs.

For some reason it's very hard to get people to do that. I finally got to the point where I just let them shove me. I've come home from trips with my eyes black and blue or my flesh bruised. Once I suffered a broken rib. A fellow I judged to be about 6 feet 6 inches tall—nearly a foot taller than I am—held me in a viselike grip and propelled me toward a door. He went through the center of the door, but I slammed against the doorjamb.

Many people tell me I do not look blind at first glance, and nothing tickles me more than to be mistaken for a sighted person. When I go to the hotel dining room, for example, I ask a waiter to read me the menu. One waiter misunderstood and said apologetically, "Mister, I'm just as ignorant as you are."

I don't wear dark glasses or carry a white cane. A long cane gets in my way in airplanes, in restaurants, and so forth, so I use the collapsible leg of a camera tripod. It can be folded and put into my pocket when I don't need it to warn me of steps and to measure the height of curbstones.

From the beginning I was determined to avoid the telltale characteristics of the blind. At Hines, my instructor drilled me in turning my head toward the persons I was addressing, "watching" the smoke curling up from my cigar and in other habits of the normal person.

To avoid using Braille notes on the dais, I memorize the substance of my speeches. As soon as I have been introduced, I usually say, "I know what I'm talking about because I'm handicapped too." Then as a sympathetic hush settles over the audience, I add, "I've got false teeth." I can hear the tension snap. A burst of laughter follows, and from then on I've got my listeners where I want them.

Some of my more amusing experiences are woven into my message. Once, for example, when my wife drove me to the Washington Airport for a trip to Miami, Fla., she discovered before I boarded the plane that I was wearing a brown checked sport jacket with gray trousers, gray vest, and gray accessories. Although I use Braille labels on my coathangers to prevent exactly this sort of confusion, I had made a mistake that morning. So I had to go on to Miami in my scrambled ensemble. When I rose to speak on the program I explained what had happened.

"And you know what my wife said to me?" I told the audience. "She said, 'Now you're not only blind but colorblind.'"

Humor is a wonderful safety valve for a handicapped person. At a west coast factory I was with a blind youth who was pushing a paraplegic to the cafeteria in a wheelchair, the paraplegic giving the directions. When the wheelchair bumped the wall slightly, the paraplegic wisecracked, "Hey, look where you're going."

"If you don't like my driving," the blind youth shot back, "get out and walk."

It would seem obvious that sighted people should immediately identify themselves when addressing a blind person, but they often forget this amenity. Sometimes the results are funny. Not long ago a blind former Army pilot gleefully told me about going to a cocktail party where a woman greeted him by throwing her arms around his neck and kissing him. He reciprocated. But when the woman broke from the affectionate clinch, he amused onlookers by inquiring, "Say, just who are you?"

She was, of course, an old friend, but not until she spoke could he be sure which old friend. I told him I could appreciate his problem because I've had the same pleasant experience several times.

Learning to compensate for lack of sight has been a constant challenge. Formerly when traveling I would read or look at the landscape. Now I have trained myself to use this time to concentrate on the tasks at hand or to meditate. I believe I have learned to think more clearly than I could before I became blind.

A byproduct of this concentration has been a tremendous development of my memory—it has become far more retentive than I ever imagined it could be. For example, while I was on the Reserve Forces Policy Board, several members once challenged my detailed recollection of the testimony a general had given the day before. They got out their copies of the general's statement and discovered that I was right. Dr. Arthur Adams, then chairman of the board, was deeply impressed and asked me how I remembered the involved testimony so clearly.

"Well, Mr. Chairman," I said, "I have an advantage—I'm not handicapped by sight."

Since I can't use a telephone directory, I have trained myself to remember some 200 telephone numbers and as many extension numbers. Also, I have developed my own system for dialing, which is faster than that used by the normal sighted person. If you doubt this claim, let me explain that I don't have to lose any time looking for the next number, and instead of waiting for the dial to spring back by itself after each movement, I move it back with my finger to give me the reference point for the next digit.

Thanks to modern science, my life at home is anything but that separate dark world which traditionally was thought to be the lot of the blind. I am virtually self-sufficient in my soundproofed office in the basement of my Washington suburban house, where I live with Kathy and my 18-year-old son, Melvin, Jr. My three daughters are now on their own—two are married and one is a captain in the Marine Corps.

Surrounding my chair are a Braille writing machine, a dictating machine, a pocket-size tape recorder, an intercom connecting me with the upstairs, a radio, and the audio part of a television set. There are many TV discussion programs and detective plays which, with a little imagination, I can enjoy probably as much as people who watch them. And I take in—effortlessly—more good literature than ever before by listening for hours on end to my "talking book" records which, incidentally, are provided free by the Library of Congress to all blind citizens of this country. On the whole, I am busier perhaps than I ever have been. I belong to 72 organizations—local, national, and international—and am quite active in 20 of them.

The degree to which a handicapped person can become usefully busy obviously is the most important key to his readjustment. On the President's committee, we define a physically handicapped person as "one who has a condition which makes normal employment difficult." We believe the committee deserves some credit for the fact that, since its start in 1947, employers in the United States have been hiring the handicapped at a rate which now runs close to 300,000 a year. Approximately 7,500,000 handicapped persons are now employed in this country, and we know of another 2 million who are employable if the right jobs are found.

The appalling additional fact is that on the basis of door-to-door surveys we estimate there are another 2 million "hidden handicapped" who are unreached by doctors and government agencies. These are unfortunates, suffering blindness, epilepsy, palsy, and the like, who have been hidden away in back rooms or attics because their relatives imagine that some social stigma is attached to such conditions. So we apparently have a long way yet to go in convincing all Americans that the handicapped are human beings like everyone else and have the same hopes, dreams and need for dignity, asking only a positive role to play in society.

When a person objects to working alongside a handicapped worker, he usually explains that he is afraid an accident will happen. But this is only an excuse and has no foundation in fact. After searching workmen's-compensation-law statistics all over the United States, we have yet to find a case where a handicapped worker caused an accident to a normal worker. Indeed, in the Hughes electronics plant in Los Angeles, 27 percent of the work force is physically handicapped in some way, yet that plant's insurance rates have been reduced several times because there hasn't been an accident among these workers in 10 years.

No; I think the reason why a normal person is uncomfortable in the presence of the disabled goes deeper than the purported fear of accidents. There is a feeling that these people are basically different. It may well be a psychological factor that can be traced to an early exposure to the grimmer kind of fairy tales, in which deformity invariably is associated with ugliness and evil.

Despite my concern for this humanitarian aspect, we keep our pitch for hiring the handicapped on a purely practical basis. Not only do they have better accident record than their coworkers but the handicapped outproduce them, and demonstrate more ingenuity in doing a job better or faster. Actually, of course, every handicapped person is—of necessity—an inventor.

My own success in drastically rebuilding my life is by no means unusual. In fact, whenever I pride myself on doing well, I hear about somebody who puts me to shame. Three years after my blindness I confessed some momentary feeling of inadequacy to a 30-year-old acquaintance who has been blind since he was 2 and could do amazing things. He laughed and said, "Oh, well, you're just a novice. Wait until you've been blind for 28 years."

But at least, in my worst moments of discouragement, I never said to myself, "Why did this have to happen to me?" After all, I feel there are few people who have had a more exciting life than I have had. Long ago I decided I had more than my share of good fortune, and I still have. My greatest compensation comes from people who approach me gratefully after a speech. Many a mother has said that I have given her hope for the future of her blind child. Others have said, "I'll never feel sorry for myself again."

My 7-year-old grandson, Marty Martino, summed it all up better than anyone else. When he got on my knee and I explained how I was able to get around, he said, "I've got it, grandfather—you can see with everything but your eyes."

MAJ. GEN. W. P. FISHER, DIRECTOR OF LEGISLATIVE LIAISON, DEPARTMENT OF AIR FORCE

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday Maj. Gen. W. P. Fisher completed his assignment and service as Director of Legislative Liaison for the Department of the Air Force and today leaves for his new assignment as Commander, Eastern Transport Air Force of the Military Air Transport Service.

Those of us who had close and direct contact with Bill Fisher during his very important and sensitive position as Director of Legislative Liaison for the Air Force know of his ability and his dedication to the service of which he is a part. The efficient, cooperative, and effective performance of his duties has impressed Members of Congress.

I take great pleasure in commending him on the performance of his staff, as well as on the manner in which he performed his functions. He and his staff have been ever mindful of the necessity for and importance of cordial relations between the Armed Forces and the legislative branch of Government. He has had keen insight and a rare perception into matters which jointly affect the Armed Forces and Congress.

As General Fisher leaves to assume his new command, which is one of great importance and responsibility, he shall carry with him the respect, admiration, and good wishes of the Members of Congress who knew him and were associated with him during the time that he served as Director of Legislative Liaison of the Air Force.

We regret that he is leaving Washington, but we know that in his new assignment he will continue his outstanding manner of performance which has characterized his career in the Air Force. Personally and officially, he has represented and maintained the very highest traditions of the armed services of the United States.

PROGRAM FOR BALANCE OF THE WEEK

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the majority leader if he can give us the program for the balance of the week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am unable to state to my friend what the program is for the balance of the week. However, I want to announce to the Members of the House that on tomorrow the highway bill will come up. That is H.R. 8678. If we have an opportunity, we will take up the military construction conference report and other conference reports as they might be in order. There are two other bills that the Committee on Rules has reported rules out on, and if I can program them for either tomorrow or Friday, I will bring them up. One is S. 2208, extending the Federal Airport Act to Alaska and Hawaii, and the other is House Resolution 360 to amend the investigative resolution relating to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I wonder, if I might ask, if there is proposed to be a session next Monday.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. GROSS. I wonder, if I might ask, if the gentleman has any information as to when the foreign giveaway bill will be back here.

Mr. McCORMACK. The foreign aid bill? I have no knowledge at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the gentleman to say that the Alaska airport bill will be scheduled tomorrow.

Mr. McCORMACK. It may come up tomorrow or the next day. Is the gentleman agreeable to that?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the gentleman is agreeable to it. I would also like to inquire—and it might be advisable to ask the attention of the gentleman on the minority side—as to whether or not consideration is being given to scheduling the bill which was reported by our committee commonly referred to as the commissioned officers bill of the Public Health Service.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, as I understand, no rule is out as yet on that.

Mr. HARRIS. I might say that I thought perhaps we might get it up under suspension, if we are going to have another suspension day. And, I do know that there has been some discussion about it. I have discussed it with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] briefly, and two or three other members of the committee. It has not been determined whether it is necessary to ask for a rule yet. But, I do call it to the attention of our distinguished majority leader because there is quite an urgency for it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Might I say to my friend, as he knows, I discussed this bill with him this afternoon.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Dr. Burney, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, called my office. In a memorandum taken, he said that there was some slight Republican opposition to the bill and, I assume, in the committee. I called Dr. Burney and I frankly told him if I was chairman of the committee, that I would not ask to bring the bill up under suspension of the rules unless I knew the Republican leadership was going to actively support the bill, because you need a two-thirds vote; that is, under suspension of the rules. My observation meant no criticism at all, but I just frankly evaluated the situation to Dr. Burney, and I told my friend from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], that I did not undertake to speak for him, but I said, "If I were chairman of the committee, Doctor, here is what I would do." The gentleman from Arkansas asked me about suspension. To begin with, that is a matter for the Speaker to decide. I would recommend strongly to my friend from Arkansas, for he knows more about parliamentary procedure than I do——

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman compliments me too highly.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, it is the truth.

Mr. HARRIS. However, I appreciate it.

Mr. McCORMACK. But I would recommend to the gentleman that before he asks the Speaker to suspend the rules he be assured that he will get a two-thirds vote. And I am practical enough to know that it is very easy to arouse almost one-third opposition to any suspension, and this is probably a bill that such opposition might be developed against without much difficulty.

Mr. HARRIS. I might say to my distinguished leader that I share his views with reference to bringing it up under suspension unless we can get the support we should have on it.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman means active support.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The Speaker has also stated to me that there is a probability that a bill might come up on Friday relating to the increase of interest on E- and H-bonds. I make that announcement because, if that can be done, that is a matter of importance.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have also been asked to inquire of the majority leader whether it is contemplated that we will be in session Saturday of this week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am hoping that it will not be necessary.

Mr. ALLEN. I have also been requested to ask whether it was likely that the labor bill would be up here on next Monday.

Mr. McCORMACK. I wish my friend would ask me that question tomorrow.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the gentleman.

AMENDMENT TO RED CROSS CHARTER TO AUTHORIZE ACTIVITIES PROMOTING PEACE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRICE). Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, it is my hope to be able to present to Congress and to the American people some time in 1960 a coordinated plan and program for the prevention of war and the establishment of a just and lasting peace.

In the course of preparing such a plan, I have received many worthy proposals. One of these that has the support of many outstanding Americans suggests that the American National Red Cross charter be amended so that the Red Cross could engage in measures to prevent war and establish peace. Naturally, the officials of the Red Cross may be reluctant to jump into this complex field, but the proposed amendment to the charter is permissive and not mandatory. Therefore, they will be able to set their own pace and may eventually accept in full the challenge of a magnificent opportunity.

Section 8 of the Red Cross charter reserves to Congress the right to amend section 3, dealing with the purposes of the organization. Therefore, a new clause could be added at the end of section 3 to read as follows:

> Sixth. And to devise and carry on measures for the prevention of war and for the establishment of a just and lasting peace.

For these reasons I have today introduced a bill to accomplish this objective. It seems to me that this proposal is compatible with the objectives of those who are interested in the Great White Fleet and other plans for peace. All of these proposals can eventually be incorporated into a comprehensive plan and program that many of us seek to develop in behalf of those millions of people who are convinced that there is no honorable or reasonable alternative to a just and lasting peace.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEYER. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my friend from Vermont on introducing this bill in relation to an amendment to the Red Cross charter. It is a very idealistic bill. Many fine people throughout the country, as the gentleman from Vermont knows, are very much interested in it. I have had talks with them. A couple of my dear friends in Boston with whom my friend from Vermont has had chats also, are interested. Without regard to the outcome of the bill, it indicates the highly idealistic mind and spirit of the gentleman from Vermont, and again I congratulate him on introducing the bill.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his compliment.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Vermont and say that this is consistent with everything he has done since he has been in Congress in the cause of peace. It is another step in the right direction and I wish him good luck with this proposal.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the gentleman from Vermont. I have never known a more dedicated, more sincere gentleman than the gentleman from Vermont. I think everyone on the committee feels as I do in regard to our dear colleague. The world of peace toward which he is looking—and I might say for which we are all praying—we will surely reach if our faith remains strong and our courage unfailing. The world of peace, for which we are reaching, will come the sooner because of such things as the gentleman from Vermont is doing. Its dawning will be hastened by our prayers and the earnest effort of every Member of this body.

I do want to take this occasion to say to the gentleman from Vermont that we, on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, give to him the greatest respect and we like him tremendously well. He is a dedicated servant of the Prince of Peace.

Mr. MEYER. I thank my good friend from Illinois very much.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE SUEZ CANAL: AN INTERNATIONAL WATERWAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRICE). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, for some time many of us who have followed events in the Near East have been disturbed by the failure to keep the Suez Canal, an international waterway, open to shipping of all nations without discrimination. Despite the Constantinople Convention and the United Nations Security Council ruling of September 1, 1951, this canal has been administered by President Nasser of the United Arab Republic as a national weapon against the State of Israel.

President Nasser's justification for blocking Israel shipping and Israel cargoes is that Egypt is in a state of war with Israel. However, despite the question of the validity of that assertion, under the Constantinople Convention the canal must be kept open both in war and in peace, and, the U.N. Security Council decision refused to accept Egypt's justification as valid. Moreover, it held that the armistice agreement between Israel and Egypt, negotiated in 1949 under the auspices of the United Nations, had ended the state of war.

By international agreement and by tradition, the Suez Canal has been considered an artery of international commerce. This in no way impugns U.A.R. sovereignty over the canal—the two are not incompatible. It does mean that such sovereignty implies a correlative responsibility to uphold freedom of navigation of the canal. Respect for treaty obligations is itself one of the essential attributes of sovereignty.

From its inception, the canal was constituted as a waterway for the passage of the ships of all nations. The concession for the building of the canal to de Lesseps in 1854 contained the following provision:

> The great maritime canal * * * and the ports attached to it shall always be open as neutral passage to every merchant ship passing through it from one sea to the other, without any distinction, exclusion, or preference either in respect of persons or nationalities.

In 1888 the Constantinople Convention in respect to freedom of passage through the canal was agreed to. Article I of that convention, an article which has never been qualified in any manner, reads:

> The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag * * *. The canal shall never be subject to the exercise of the right of blockade.

In its white paper on the Nationalization of the Suez Maritime Canal Company, published on August 12, 1956, the Government of Egypt acknowledged on page 68:

> The 1888 convention stands intact whether the canal is administered by the company or by the Egyptian Government.

Further, on page 71, it declared:

> On announcing the nationalization of the Suez Canal Company, the Egyptian Government reaffirmed its determination to guarantee the freedom of navigation in the canal. In no way did the nationalization of the Suez Canal Company affect the freedom of navigation in the canal as borne out by the number of ships (amounting to 766) which passed through the canal during the past 2 weeks.

On October 19, 1954, an agreement was signed in Cairo between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Egyptian Government regarding the Suez Canal base. Article 8 of that treaty reads:

> The two contracting governments recognize that the Suez Maritime Canal, which is an integral part of Egypt, is a waterway economically, commercially, and strategically of international importance, and express the determination to uphold the convention guaranteeing the freedom of navigation of the canal signed at Constantinople on the 29th of October 1888.

Thus, the United Arab Republic has itself recognized, acknowledged, and affirmed the guarantee of freedom of passage through the canal for the ships of all nations.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss exhaustively the legal aspects of the guarantee of freedom of passage through the Suez Canal. I do, however, in concluding my remarks at this point, want to refer to the United Nations Security Council resolution of September 1, 1951. This resolution resulted from a request by Israel to the Security Council that it discuss "restrictions imposed by Egypt on the passage of ships through the Suez Canal." The Council adopted this subject on its agenda and in September of 1951 passed a resolution calling upon Egypt "to terminate the restrictions on the passage of international commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal wherever bound and to cease all interference with such shipping beyond that essential to the safety of shipping in the canal itself."

Because this resolution has such direct bearing on the matter under discussion, I include it at this point in my remarks:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL OF THE UNITED NATIONS, SEPTEMBER 1, 1951

The Security Council,

1. Recalling that in its resolution of August 11, 1949, relating to the conclusion of armistice agreements between Israel and the neighboring Arab States it drew attention to the pledges in these agreements against further acts of hostility between the parties;

2. Recalling further that in its resolution of November 17, 1950, it reminded the states concerned that the armistice agreements to which they are parties contemplate the return to permanent peace in Palestine, and therefore urged them and other states in the area to take all such steps as will lead to the settlement of the issues between them;

3. Noting the report of the chief of staff of the Truce Supervision Organization to the Security Council of June 12, 1951;

4. Further noting that the chief of staff of the Truce Supervision Organization recalled the statement of the senior Egyptian delegate in Rhodes on January 13, 1949, to the effect that his delegation was inspired "with every spirit of cooperation, conciliation, and a sincere desire to restore peace in Palestine," and that the Egyptian Government have not complied with the earnest plea of the chief of staff made to the Egyptian delegate on June 12, 1951, that they desist from the present practice of interfering with the passage through the Suez Canal of goods destined for Israel;

5. Considering that since the armistice regime which has been in existence for nearly 2½ years is of a permanent character, neither party can reasonably assert that it is actively a belligerent or requires to exercise the right of visit, search, and seizure for any legitimate purpose of self-defense;

6. Finds that the maintenance of the practice mentioned in paragraph 4 above is inconsistent with the objectives of a peaceful settlement between the parties and the establishment of a permanent peace in Palestine set forth in the armistice agreement;

7. Further finds that such practice is an abuse of the exercise of the right of visit, search and seizure;

8. Further finds that that practice cannot in the prevailing circumstances be justified on the grounds that it is necessary for self-defense;

9. And further noting that the restrictions on the passage of goods through the Suez Canal to Israeli ports are denying to nations at no time connected with the conflict in Palestine valuable supplies required for their economic reconstruction, and that these restrictions together with sanctions applied by Egypt to certain ships which have visited Israeli ports represent unjustified interference with the rights of nations to navigate the seas and to trade freely with one another, including the Arab States and Israel;

10. Calls upon Egypt to terminate the restrictions on the passage of international commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal wherever bound and to cease all interference with such shipping beyond that essential to the safety of shipping in the Canal itself and to the observance of the international conventions in force.

Article 24 of the United Nations Charter entrusts the Security Council with the "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security." The same article states that members of the United Nations "agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf." The obligatory character of the Security Council resolutions is established in article 25 of the charter: "The members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present charter."

There is no reservation in this provision. There is no doubt as well, that the United Arab Republic has not abided by the terms of this resolution but has continued to impose a blockade on the shipping of Israel.

This then is the background to the international character of the Suez Canal. Unfortunately, universal freedom of navigation through the canal is not applied today as the U.A.R. consistently refuses passage to Israel cargoes and shipping.

I do not intend today, to go into a lengthy discussion on the background of this controversy, or to point up the opportunities the free world has lost to persuade the United Arab Republic to open the canal. However, in recent months our attention has been called to the fact that the United Arab Republic is applying for a loan from the World Bank in order to widen and deepen the canal. This is an exceedingly worthy project, we all will agree. I am certain that all of us believe the canal should be widened and improved to meet the needs of modern commerce. At the same time however, we felt strongly that the canal must be opened to international shipping. It would be most extraordinary if an international agency such as the World Bank were to advance the funds to finance this improvement without securing recognition from President Nasser that he will respect the international character of this seaway.

Although I do believe that the World Bank does have a responsibility to all nations, I, of course, have due regard for the fact that as an international agency its decisions are not subject to congressional approval—no more so than to the approval of other nations. The United States is, however, one of the largest stockholders in the Bank—we own some 28 percent of its stock; and, the authorization for America's participation and support of the Bank is subject to congressional control.

And, I believe that the World Bank, as a specialized agency of the United Nations, should be sensitive to past international decision as well as to public opinion in the United States and throughout the free world.

Accordingly, 12 other members of the House Banking and Currency Committee—which of course, handles legislation involving the World Bank—joined with me on August 26 in directing an appeal on this point to the president of the World Bank, the Honorable Eugene R. Black. In our letter we urged that agency to withhold action on the loan until such time as full guarantee is given that the canal is in truth, an international seaway.

Our letter stated:

We believe that the international community should not provide assistance to the U.A.R. for the canal improvement, lest it appear to condone a clear violation of international decision, an intolerable aggression by one nation against a neighbor. * * * We do insist that no money be used to finance an international artery until it is recognized as such without limitation or restriction.

I would like to introduce into the RECORD at this point the text of this letter, which was signed by the following Members of the House: HUGH J. ADDONIZIO, BYRON L. JOHNSON, JAMES C. HEALEY, FLORENCE P. DWYER, EDWARD J. DERWINSKI, WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD, CHARLES A. VANIK, SEYMOUR HALPERN, MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS, ABRAHAM J. MULTER, WILLIAM H. MILLIKEN, Jr., PAUL A. FINO, and GORDON L. MCDONOUGH.

AUGUST 26, 1959.

The Honorable EUGENE R. BLACK,
President, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, as members of the House of Representatives Banking and Currency Committee, wish to bring to your attention our serious personal concern in regard to the situation surrounding the proposed loan by the International Bank to the United Arab Republic for the purpose of enlarging the Suez Canal.

A vital international waterway, the canal should, of course, be open to the commerce of all nations. Instead it is being used as a weapon in relations between the Arab nations, particularly the United Arab Republic and the State of Israel. The refusal by Egypt to permit a non-Israel ship, Inge Toft, to carry an Israel cargo through the canal is the most recent in a long series of illegal actions which violate the Constantinople Convention and the United Nations Security Council decision. We are aware that Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold has been in negotiation with President Nasser, but up to this time we have seen no official pronouncement or action testifying to the successful outcome of these discussions.

As long as the canal, a major artery of international commerce, is being used for belligerent action by a nation which insists on remaining in a state of war with a neighbor, we are deeply disturbed that an international agency is considering a loan to improve and enlarge it. Colonel Nasser's violent declamation threatening to exterminate Israel, which has been condemned as intemperate by leading newspapers, implies that he will bar Israel shipping whenever he wants to. His own statement of July 22 shows that he is disturbed by Israel's growing trade with Asia and Africa, and that he intends to block it if he can because he is at war with Israel.

These statements brought sharp editorial comments from the Nation's leading newspapers. May we quote, for example, the New York Times in its July 28 editorial:

"The question keeps rising as to whether a person who talks as irresponsibly as President Nasser is a worthy representative of his people, a good subject for international credit, or a guarantee of something representing peace and civilization in the Middle East."

We believe that the international community should not provide assistance to the United Arab Republic for the Canal improvement, lest it appear to condone a clear violation of international decision, as intolerable aggression by one nation against a neighbor.

We feel free to write you in frank terms because we are aware of the constructive role you have played in the past in the negotiations revolving about the Suez, especially in connection with the settlement with the stockholders. We are not addressing ourselves to the particular diplomatic or political question involved. We do insist that no money be used to finance an international artery until it is recognized as such without limitation or restriction.

With our high regard and best wishes.

Yours very truly,

HUGH J. ADDONIZIO, BYRON L. JOHNSON, JAMES C. HEALEY, FLORENCE P. DWYER, EDWARD J. DERWINSKI, WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD, CHARLES A. VANIK, SEYMOUR HALPERN, MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS, ABRAHAM J. MULTER, WILLIAM H. MILLIKEN, Jr., PAUL A. FINO, GORDON L. MCDONOUGH, Members of Congress.

Our letter, Mr. Speaker, in essence, is a plea for reasonableness and adherence to, and respect for, international agreement and law. If the world is to journey toward the goal of justice for all peoples and nations, the road must be constructed upon respect for law and adherence to commitments. There is no other way to assure peace and fairness.

It is precisely because the United Arab Republic has insisted that it may violate its commitments with impunity that concern has arisen about the making of the contemplated loan. If that nation feels that it can unilaterally decide at any time what ships shall travel through the canal, it reduces to a shambles any respect for international law. It means, in effect, that tomorrow or the next day the carriers of Japan or Brazil or the United States can be excluded from the right of transit. And this despite the language of article I of the Constantinople Convention, "shall always be open to every vessel without distinction of flag." There are no reservations in that article, apparently, except such as the United Arab Republic determines. This is, tragically, an invitation to international anarchy. There is therefore deep reason for concern and for the raising of the question of a loan by the international community under such circumstances.

Furthermore, the attitude of the United Arab Republic constitutes a threat to the trade and economic development of many nations, both of the East and the West, which have been set in their existing form because of the existence of the Suez Canal and because governments and traders in many countries had been able confidently to rely on its free and open use. The fact that this could be disrupted at the will of one nation, raises further doubt about the making of an international loan at this time.

It is not surprising therefore, that our letter should have evoked a violent reaction from the Cairo press, but this expected bitter language only, unfortunately, serves to prove our point. The New York Times in a story on August 29 reported that a Cairo newspaper, resorting to name calling and denunciation, described the congressional authors of the letter as "biased and ignorant," and quoted the government press spokesman as asserting that Israel ships "shall never pass through the Suez Canal except over our dead bodies."

I am happy to note that the same issue of the New York Times which carried the dispatch from Cairo thought it proper to publish an editorial upholding the validity of our contentions and fully supporting the position of a free and open canal as a requisite before the granting of the World Bank loan.

Mr. Speaker, I include at this point the editorial which appeared in the New York Times on August 29:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 29, 1959]

THE CANAL AND THE BANK

The technical aspects of arranging a loan by the World Bank for the United Arab Republic to widen and deepen the Suez Canal seem to have been settled in Cairo. The political aspects have not. This appears to be the gist of the impasse that has now been reached.

Obviously, the canal should be improved to take more and larger ships. The whole world would gain if that were done, and sooner or later it must be done. However, the World Bank is not a completely free agent. In theory it acts on a strictly financial and economic basis; in practice there are bound to be occasions where its decisions cut across political lines. This is one of them, as the letter of protest sent by thirteen members of our House of Representatives to Eugene Black, president of the bank, demonstrates.

The canal is an international thoroughfare, but it now belongs to the United Arab Republic. President Nasser continues to refuse to allow Israel ships or even cargo destined to Israel through the canal. As long ago as Sept. 1, 1951, the Security Council of the United Nations adopted a resolution calling on Egypt "to terminate the restrictions on the passage of commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal wherever bound, and to cease all interference with such shipping beyond that essential to the safety of shipping in the canal itself."

If President Nasser can get his financing privately no one would have a right to complain, but Israel is a member of the World Bank, even if a modest one. There are also other members who would not want to see the bank finance work on behalf of the Suez Canal so long as Colonel Nasser refuses to meet his international obligations. It should be made a condition of any loan that the Suez Canal be a truly international thoroughfare, without limitations or restrictions.

Many other publications have taken similar views. I note that the Economist of London said on June 13: "The pressure on Cairo would be much greater if the World Bank insisted before granting its loan that Egypt should honestly and in full carry out its obligations."

And, in this morning's New York Herald Tribune there appeared a thoughtful editorial on the question of the loan which I include in the RECORD at this point in my remarks:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Sept. 2, 1959]

SENATOR FULBRIGHT ON THE MIDDLE EAST

It is perfectly true, as Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT says, that the Middle East picture is considerably brighter—or at least quieter—than it was a year ago. Then, if we may recall, American troops had gone into Lebanon, British into Jordan; and Iraq, after a violent revolution, was almost universally thought to be on the way to communism.

Today, by contrast, Lebanon is tranquil, Jordan strengthened and Iraq, rather than moving toward Soviet Russia, is keeping a wary eye on Moscow and the West alike. Relations between some of the Arab nations, notably the U.A.R. and Jordan, have been patched up at least temporarily and—again temporarily—border violence between the U.A.R. and Israel has subsided.

Against this unusually quiet background, Senator FULBRIGHT's call for a new long-range American policy in the Middle East to replace "impromptu measures" seems more startling than stirring. The landing of American soldiers in Lebanon and British paratroops in Jordan may have been impromptu measures, but they worked. And if the people of the Arab States really are, to quote Senator FULBRIGHT, "in the process of establishing the stability and relative calm essential to the development of representative government and economic growth," they surely can count upon the long-range support and understanding of the American Government.

We do not dispute that a close and continuing examination of our policies in the Middle East is important. But Senator FULBRIGHT's proposal for a "more mature and realistic" approach to the area is so vague as to leave doubts of what he really has in mind. One example he chose of what he calls the West's failure to comprehend "the full capabilities of the Arabs themselves"—Egypt's successful operation of the Suez Canal—is particularly inappropriate. The fear was not that Nasser, with the liberal use of foreign technicians, would be unable to operate the canal physically. It was that he would turn it into a weapon of Egyptian foreign policy in contravention of all precedent and of the conditions upon which he got it back. The impounding of Israeli cargoes in the canal since last February demonstrates that the concern over the future of the canal was more than justified.

The matter of the canal and the U.A.R. is likely to be brought up in the forthcoming session of the U.N. General Assembly. What would be Senator FULBRIGHT's suggestion for policy regarding this?

Mr. Speaker, it is our earnest hope that the course we are advocating will help to reduce tensions in the Near East. The free world cannot continue to condone a brazen violation of a United Nations decision and of international law. We favor, of course, the improvement of relations between the United States and the United Arab Republic. We ask, however, that the U.A.R. observe its obligations and respect the rights of other peoples.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALPERN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. I want to join with the gentleman from New York in his remarks referring to the attitude of the United Arab Republic insofar as committing piracy on what are the high seas. In that connection, on June 18, I wrote a letter to the President of the United States, and I think I can read it at this time because it is quite appropriate. The letter follows:

JUNE 18, 1959.

Hon. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
The President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am prompted to write to you by my concern over Egypt's refusal to permit Danish and other ships unobstructed passage through the Suez Canal because they carry cargoes from Israel. These cargoes have been seized and confiscated by Egypt as a prize of war.

I am sure that you share the concern I have expressed. Free passage through the Canal is guaranteed by the 1888 Suez Convention, by U.N. resolution, and the six principles accepted by Egypt in 1956.

Our country is on record in support of these guarantees of the international character of the Suez Canal.

This record makes it unlikely that we would endure continued violations of the Suez agreement. It would seem unlikely that under these circumstances the World Bank could make the loan to the U.A.R. for widening the Suez Canal. Egypt's argument in defense of its action against Israel were rejected by the United Nations Security Council as far back as 1951. Her current violations directly impinge upon the rights not alone of Israel but of every nation which sends ships through the Canal. The Suez is an international waterway which cannot be subject to the whim of an individual and the uncertainties of domestic Egyptian politics.

The efforts of United Nations officers to obtain the release of the "Inge Toft" and its cargo have so far been unsuccessful. The situation created by this impasse contains elements of an extremely dangerous situation. It can deteriorate unless it is dealt with firmly and promptly.

In this circumstance I would appeal to you most urgently to bring the influence of your high office to bear in support of the United Nations efforts and upon the Government of the United Arab Republic to the end that it will desist from its present unlawful actions. I make this appeal in confidence that we are in accord, for I recall the strong statement that you made on February 21, 1957, when you declared that any renewed violation by Egypt "should be dealt with firmly by the society of nations". There is every reason to hope that your words at this juncture will bring about a satisfactory and peaceful solution to this problem.

Respectfully yours,

LEONARD FARBSTEIN,
Member of Congress.

On June 30 I received an answer from the Department of State. The answer which, after relating some of the history in relation to this situation, included the following:

The recent seizures of several cargoes bound from Israel aboard non-Israeli ships, and the current detention of a Danish flag vessel, have again raised the issue of free transit through the canal after a period of apparently satisfactory transit of cargoes originating in Israel. The United Nations and the parties concerned are currently engaged in trying to resolve the problem which has been created by these recent difficulties. We understand that the Secretary General of the United Nations will shortly visit Cairo for discussions of a number of questions including the Inge Toft case.

It is hoped that the transit problem may be resolved between the parties immediately concerned, and we are seeking to encourage and support the continuing efforts on the part of Mr. Hammarskjold. The U.S. Government has already discussed the Suez transit question in various foreign capitals, including Cairo and Tel Aviv, and you may be assured that we will continue to take any appropriate measures which may contribute to a resolution of this problem.

If I can be of any further assistance to you, please do not hesitate to write.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

Now, I would like to state for the RECORD that I feel that the letter of the State Department advising me that they will continue to take any appropriate measures which may contribute to a resolution of this problem is too nebulous.

I suggest that a definite answer to the effect that we will discontinue the sale to Egypt of commodities under Public Law 480, which in effect is a gift, and special assistance under the mutual security law so long as the violation continues. Further I would suggest that the World Bank be informed of our displeasure in Nasser's act of violating the 1888 Suez convention and the U.N. resolutions as sufficient to make inadvisable a loan to Egypt for the purpose of widening the Suez Canal which is being used for purposes other than that agreed upon, namely restricting its use to those nations that the Egyptian dictator favors. We would be compounding a violation of the U.N. resolution and the Suez convention.

Unless Nasser is stopped he will make an inland waterway out of what is recognized throughout the world as an international waterway.

Failure to take strong action and make strong representation would be in derogation of the President's strong statement of February 21, 1957. I feel that the President should reaffirm the position he took then, namely, "Any renewed violation by Egypt should be dealt with firmly by the society of nations."

Let me add now that nothing affirmatively has been done by the President or the State Department with relation to this situation. The UAR has gone even further, because on the 20th of August this year the United Arab Republic confiscated a case of meteorological books and instruments dispatched from a scientific institute in Australia to the Israeli meteorological services. The cargo was seized at Port Said.

I might say further that in this morning's press I read that it had become necessary for the Israeli Government to direct that two of their own frigates which they had detained in the Red Sea, that were supposed to go through the Gulf of Aqaba, frigates that were sold to Ceylon, were not sent because of fear of an explosion. Despite the obvious threat they have now been directed by the Israeli Government to proceed through the Gulf of Aqaba. I say again that unless this country, unless the President shows that we will take strong measures to stop this piracy, a further conflagration might erupt. I reiterate it is as much the fault of the President of the United States in not reasserting the strong position he took at the time he requested France, England and Israel remove themselves from Sinai that this situation has resulted. At that time he said strong action would be taken if necessary, but to this date nothing has been done. So I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN], aside from the statement he has just made that he also confer with the President, who is of his own party, to try to see to it that he do something affirmative with relation to this situation. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALPERN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to salute Congressman HALPERN for his efforts which have resulted in his taking this special order and which points to the fact that 13 Members of Congress have joined to urge the World Bank to withhold a proposed loan to the United Arab Republic for the Suez Canal.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlemen who have preceded me here tonight and join with them in registering my deep and personal concern in regard to the situation surrounding the proposed loan by the International Bank to the United Arab Republic for the purpose of enlarging the Suez Canal. Colonel Nasser has requested a loan from the International World Bank for expansion and improvement on the Suez Canal. It is difficult at this time to see how the International World Bank could grant this loan to the saber-rattling Colonel Nasser when he has not respected the Constantinople agreement of 1888 which set up the canal as an international waterway. The refusal of the U.A.R. to permit passage of the Danish ship, Inge Toft, carrying Israeli cargo, is only one of a series of incidents precipitated by the United Arab Republic against the State of Israel; as recently as the end of July of this year Colonel Nasser has made several acrid speeches threatening the very existence of the State of Israel—that bastion of democracy in the Middle East.

The United Nations attempts of Dag Hammarskjold and Ralph Bunche to negotiate with Cairo to bring about a working agreement concerning the "state of belligerence" that has existed between the United Arab Republic and Israel have not been productive. The United Arab Republic continued to talk belligerence and continues to deny the existence of the State of Israel, while Prime Minister Ben-Gurion has pleaded and fought for a just peace.

With the fluidity of the arrangement on shipping through the canal whereby at one time Israeli shipments are allowed through the canal and on another occasion they are detained, such a loan by the International World Bank should be withheld.

As a condition precedent guarantees must be made that this vital international waterway would be open to the shipping of all countries without such limitations and restrictions as are currently being placed on the canal by the United Arab Republic.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALPERN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to associate myself with the gentleman from New York and other speakers in their remarks and to commend the gentleman for bringing this very important subject to the attention of this Congress.

There is no question that affirmative action is necessary at this time by the President to preclude any further loans to Mr. Nasser so long as Israel is being harassed and being denied the use of the Suez Canal.

What sort of international society do we live in when the dictator of Egypt can approach the International Bank and ask for additional funds on one hand when, on the other hand, he is denying the use of the canal to the gallant people of Israel?

I think it becomes incumbent upon the formulators of our foreign policy to abandon their policy of desperation. That is what we have now, a foreign policy of desperation. They should put us back on a sound road where principles are again going to become the mainstay of our foreign policy. I certainly hope that the President is going to instruct his subordinates to take firm action in this matter so that once and for all Mr. Nasser is going to recognize the fact that Israel today is too well established, too noble a nation, has made too large a contribution to the peace and success and progress of the world to continue to be harassed and to be ignored.

Israel today must have access to the canal, the same access everyone else has, if she is going to continue her magnificent development and growth.

I wish to congratulate the gentleman for bringing this whole subject to the attention of the House in a special order.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALPERN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARBSTEIN], as well as the other Members who supported the statements which were made by them. I feel they were very timely in view of the fact that Members of the other body have already expressed themselves on this situation. I feel that every Member of Congress should join these Members in urging a change in policy to take place in support of the little nation which has fought for Western democracy.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may extend their remarks on this subject at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE EDUCATION AND WELFARE OF AMERICAN YOUTH AND CURRENT PROPOSALS OF THE 86TH CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOLL] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, there are no factors of greater concern to the Congress than those which affect the fullest development of the potential of the youth of this Nation. Past legislation has in many instances opened new avenues for thousands of boys and girls by providing essential financial support to State programs which have service to youth as their primary aim. Current legislative proposals continue to reflect the concern of the Congress and the Nation with the need for the establishment, expansion, and enrichment of youth opportunities. All thinking people fully realize that to neglect the changing needs of the youth of a society is to encourage the eventual death of a way of life. It was Aristotle who, some 23 centuries ago, said:

> No one will doubt that the legislator should direct his attention above all to the education of youth; for the neglect of education does harm to the constitution. [Politics, Book VIII, ch. 1.]

For us, therefore, the question continues to be, how can we best provide assistance to our young people who, in addition to making the normal adjustments our society necessitates, have also the burdens of adjustment which accompany an era of rapid technological and scientific expansion.

I do not propose to know which of the programs of the States and the Nation are most essential at this time and in this era. There are many programs which, as you know, fulfill a continuing need, while other temporary emergency measures have also proved extremely effective and beneficial. There are, however, certain of the State and national programs relating to our young people which are of special interest to me; in particular, the programs of the Children's Bureau, Federal and State plans improving the health of our children, Federal assistance to impacted school districts, the proposed Youth Conservation Corps, aid for teachers salaries, and the pressing problems of our institutions of higher education.

Because of the effectiveness of these particular programs, I take this opportunity; one, to review them in brief and to consider their continuing role of service to today's youth; two, to discuss our congressional responsibility for review and support of these programs on an increased financial basis; and three, to consider some of the current legislative proposals which are designed to meet present day educational needs.

THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU

One Government agency which has made the welfare of American youth its primary concern is the Children's Bureau. You will recall that the Children's Bureau derives its authority from the basic act of April 9, 1912, by which it was created and charged with "investigating and reporting upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child-life among all classes of people." Under title V of the Social Security Act the Bureau derives authority to administer grants to the States for, first, maternal and child health service; second, crippled children's services; and, third, child welfare services.

The work of the Children's Bureau in the past has been highly significant, and has resulted in many instances in improved State programs for children. The remarkable decline in the rates of infant and maternal mortality during this century has largely been a result of Children's Bureau activities. The year 1960 also promises to be a very full year for the Bureau. This fact becomes apparent after only a glimpse of the Bureau's program as outlined and presented to this Congress during the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations—Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare Appropriations for 1960.

It is reported that during 1959–60 the Bureau will continue to give emphasis to helping the States in improving State child welfare legislation, since within the past year, many States have requested assistance with proposals for such legislation. Future plans include the tabulation of changes in State legislation, and the classification and collection of data for use in State requests.

The Bureau also plans to continue to give high priority to program areas designed to alleviate the stresses on family life brought about by efforts to maintain the family in time of crisis and by the ever-increasing numbers of working mothers. You may also be interested to know that the Children's Bureau is cooperating with the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor in conducting a survey of national agencies, public and voluntary, to determine their interests, concerns, and programs in day care of children. This is perhaps of special interest to many of us because there is currently proposed legislation—S. 1286—before this Congress to provide Federal financial assistance for day care programs for children of working mothers. During this year, several conferences will be sponsored by the Children's Bureau to review information available from various sources and to consider steps which should be taken by National, State, and local agencies in providing day care facilities and services.

Other program services of the Bureau which are of a continuing nature embrace the problem area of juvenile delinquency, research in child life and services for children; and the preparation of information for parents and others working with children.

One of the highlights of the year 1960 will certainly be the sixth White House Conference on Children and Youth. It was the first of these conferences in 1909 which initiated the establishment of the Children's Bureau, and each conference thereafter has produced significant gains for children. Although many Government agencies will cooperate in this conference effort, the Children's Bureau will be the focal point in the Government for planning and organizing the conference.

The purpose of the 1960 White House Conference is "to promote opportunities for children and youth to realize their full potential for a creative life in freedom and dignity." Conference participants will include professional educators, parents, teachers, social workers, sociologists, psychologists, and many other professional and lay people who will attempt to understand and evaluate the effect of the stresses of the day upon children and youth and the fulfillment of those goals expressed in the conference purpose.

We realize, of course, that in order for the Children's Bureau to continue to provide its present services and programs of assistance and to expand and enrich programs in keeping with growing needs, the Congress must, through increased appropriations and needed legislation, make available the necessary financial support.

SCHOOL MEDICAL CARE

Good health and adequate health care for our children have long been goals in our country, but they are goals not always realized. During World War II the Nation in general became concerned about the numbers of boys rejected by the Armed Forces for various reasons. Today we are beginning to understand that medical care for our children is as important to their development as sound citizens as it is to the development of sound soldiers. For, as Steinhaus has observed, the purpose of total fitness may be "to assure survival on the human plane—survival of the body, mind, finer motives, and higher aspirations of man and spirit" together with a keen enjoyment of living.

Recognizing the importance of proper health care for needy children, the Federal Government in the 1956 amendments to the Social Security Act made special provisions for better medical care for children on the federally aided aid to dependent children rolls. Under this legislation, the Federal Government pays to the States an amount equal to half of State expenditures for payments in behalf of these needy children, up to a maximum of $3 per month per child times the number of children on the rolls. In Pennsylvania, payments for medical care for such children are made directly to the practitioner from a pooled medical care fund. This fund is maintained by payment of a monthly premium for each needy child into the fund by the department of public welfare. Freedom of choice of doctors is maintained by the device of paying the doctor, from the fund, for services rendered in an amount determined by an established schedule of fees.

In addition to this plan, used by most of the States for all of their federally-assisted public assistance plans—old-age assistance, aid to the permanently and totally disabled, and aid to the blind as well as aid to dependent children—my own State of Pennsylvania has expanded the concept to include children whose school health record shows a condition requiring medical, dental, or surgical treatment if his parents cannot pay for the necessary treatment. Under this program the State government provides medical, dental, or surgical treatment and hospital care if an examination of the family's assets shows that they are not sufficient to allow for these expenses. Thus the State of Pennsylvania recognizes that a family, otherwise self-sufficient, may postpone needed medical care for their children because they cannot afford the extra heavy medical expenses. We recognize that medical care costs may be heavy but temporary, and do not, therefore, make the requirement, common in the Aid to Dependent Children programs, that a showing of need requires the exhaustion first of all personal property or income before any payments can be made. We further recognize in this School Medical Care program that every family, depending upon its size, needs a certain amount of money to meet the usual costs of running a home.

The plan of treatment, in such cases, is worked out by the school authorities—usually including the school nurse—and the doctor, dentist, or hospital providing the services the child needs. The amount charged is never more than the cost. If the family is able to pay part of this cost, the department of public welfare pays the rest. If not, the State pays the total bill—again an amount never more than cost.

The effects of this plan on the health of our school children in Pennsylvania is suggested by the fact that the biennial school health examinations during the 2 school years 1951–53 showed a considerable drop in the number of remediable defects which had neither been corrected or were under treatment over the 1946–47 census. In 1946–47, about 50 percent of the State's enrolled pupils were reported as having such remediable defects. By 1951–53 this figure had dropped to a little over one-third—or 36 percent. This drop, it is generally agreed, is an indication of the effectiveness of the States 1945 school health law.

THE EDUCATION PROGRAMS OF FEDERALLY IMPACTED AREAS

Many of you have undoubtedly been impressed, as I have been, with the overwhelming success of the companion laws 815 and 874 providing Federal financial assistance to school districts which have been burdened because of Federal activity. Now in its tenth year, this program has provided assistance to these affected school districts so that they can continue to provide an up-to-date program of learning for all pupils in spite of the swelling enrollments.

You are probably familiar with the report of the U.S. Commissioner of Education which outlines the success of these maintenance and operation and construction programs. I was impressed with the fact that in only 9 years of operation, under Public Law 874, the number of participating school districts has trebled, and the number of federally connected pupils has doubled. Furthermore, the average daily attendance of federally connected pupils constitutes about 15 percent of the total attendance in eligible school districts.

Dr. Derthick has also reported that these school districts in federally affected areas provide educational service to some 7.5 million pupils which is almost 25 percent of all pupils in attendance at public elementary and secondary schools.

Moreover, under Public Law 815, more than 4,000 construction projects have been approved to provide about 45,626 classrooms to house 1,321,417 pupils in 1,800 different school districts. It is no wonder that Congress has amended and extended these companion laws several times since their enactment; and that the 85th Congress not only extended the programs for an additional three-year period, but also made the program permanent as it relates to children of Federal employees who both work and reside on Federal property.

I am distressed, however, by the Administration support given to a measure—H.R. 7140—currently being considered by the Congress which would amend the federally impacted area laws to reduce certain payments. In view of the impacted area aid program's growth and because of the clear need for expanding, rather than restricting, our educational system in this country, this amendment hardly seems warranted.

We well know that each State has its own particular problems relating to impacted area assistance. Perhaps some of the States would not suffer any serious loss as a result of the proposed amendment to reduce certain of these funds, however, in the State of Pennsylvania, a cut-back in program funds at this time would certainly make a noticeable dent. For example, at the Olmsted Air Force Base alone, some 62 school districts would be affected. It is my hope that the proposed amendments to cut the impacted area assistance program will find little support among the Members of this body.

YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

I have also been very anxious that more of our young people have the opportunity to experience the very wholesome life which accompanies work in the out-of-doors. Not only could such experiences prove to be physically rewarding, but there could also result an extensive program for the recreation of neglected scenic areas, parks, and so forth, for the development of a more beautiful America.

With these purposes in mind, I have introduced a bill which would establish a Youth Conservation Corps. This same type of proposal has had many other sponsors during this session of the Congress. Generally, the programs would recruit young people into service on a voluntary basis, to work in our forests and our mountains on much-needed reclamation and conservation projects.

The program of the Youth Conservation Corps would probably have widespread appeal to the young people who are "city dwellers" since these boys and girls often are not exposed to life in the great out-of-doors. I hardly need speak of the many benefits to be derived from such a program in terms of improved park facilities, replanted forests, and revitalized rivers and wildlife refuges. We are all, perhaps, vividly aware of the deplorable conditions of neglect and abuse which exist in many of these areas.

We might draw a guide of the possible measure of success of a Youth Conservation Corps by reviewing some of the benefits of the Civilian Conservation Corps which, as you know, was initiated under the administration of Franklin Roosevelt. Many persons have referred to the success of the CCC in their statements which enthusiastically support a YCC. For example, Mr. Ralph C. Wible, chief of forests of the State of Pennsylvania has written:

> In Pennsylvania we are reaping the benefits of the work of the Civilian Conservation Corps. Many of our State parks and other forestry programs were created by the CCC. Having had intimate experience with this work, I can testify to the great value of the CCC program for the men who took part in it.

I might also mention that the Governor of Pennsylvania is among 11 State Governors who have personally endorsed a YCC program.

Certainly in these modern times when more people enjoy leisure and more families seek wholesome recreation in park areas, we would do well to preserve such lands, while at the same time affording to ambitious and energetic young people a rare experience in healthful outdoor living, and group dynamics at work and play. It is my sincere hope that this body will realize the value of a Youth Conservation Corps program and will enact such a measure.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO TEACHERS SALARIES

We are all aware of the fact that one of the reasons most frequently given by teachers for leaving the teaching profession is because there is not enough income. A survey made in 1956, for example, showed that the average teacher who switched to another occupation earned $1,323 more per year. It seems to me that this loss of thousands of capable teachers from our classrooms as a result of poor pay is especially disgraceful in these times when we are increasingly aware of the vital role of education in the preparation of young people for the work of today and tomorrow and for the responsibilities of adult citizenship.

Those persons who remain in the classroom often find it necessary to supplement their incomes with a second job. Thus they are forced to devote less time to their preparation for classroom instruction. According to the National Education Association, almost one-third of America's teachers, because of inadequate salaries, must supplement their incomes with a second job. About 18 percent of our public school teachers are still paid a salary of under $3,500 a year.

Poor pay and numerous out-of-class demands which have been placed upon the teacher have not only driven qualified instructors out of the classroom. These factors also had the effect of holding in the classroom a large number of teachers who have substandard credentials. At the opening of this 1958–59 school year, the U.S. Office of Education reported that some 7.1 percent of the public school teachers had less than standard certificates.

I share the concern, which many of you have also expressed, over the economic status of the public-school teacher. I, too, believe that this problem presents one of the most urgent of our educational need areas today. I strongly favor the use of Federal financial assistance to the States as a means of supporting their individual efforts to increase teachers' salaries. And, as you perhaps know, I have introduced a bill—H.R. 7574—which would provide for this type of assistance.

I have also supported the Murray-Metcalf proposals—S. 2 and H.R. 22—which would give to the individual State a choice between using Federal funds for public-school teachers' salaries or school construction. In supporting this measure, I fully acknowledge that needs vary from State to State. Whereas the greater need in my district is for increased teachers' salaries, in other districts the greater need might well be for school construction.

But it is not enough to speak only of the public-school teachers' economic plight as a reason for Federal financial assistance for increased salaries, for such an assistance program would have a more far-reaching significance. A very important factor would be the nationwide recognition given to the work of the classroom teacher with whom lies the tremendous responsibility of teaching not only the fundamentals of the academic world, but the whole framework within which our democratic form of government functions. I am convinced that there is no more important legislative proposal before this Congress than that which would provide the States with needed Federal financial assistance for public-school teachers' salaries.

EXPANDED OPPORTUNITIES FOR HIGHER EDUCATION

The illustrious Alfred North Whitehead once said:

> In the conditions of modern life, the rule is absolute: The race which does not value trained intelligence is doomed.

Perhaps never before in history has this statement held more meaning, for rarely have conditions around the world demanded more of the trained person, or more of our institutions of higher education in providing this training. Yet there are still large numbers of capable students who, upon completion of their high-school education, do not go on to college, or who fail to realize the relationship between higher education and the fulfillment of their more distant goals.

I do not believe that it is possible for us to itemize in a 1-2-3-4 fashion the reasons why many capable students do not go to college. However, it seems clear that among these factors which appear to deter many students from the pursuit of higher education are the lack of the financial means to pay for 4 years of college and/or graduate study, and a lack of motivation toward such undertakings.

There is very little we can do as a legislative body to insure the proper motivation of good students. About the most we can do along these lines is to try, through our individual contacts, to inspire young students and to help build in the community a respect for learning. There is much we can do as Members of Congress, however, in terms of providing opportunities for higher education for those for whom the financial factor is the primary barrier. I think this has been realized by the large majority of the Members of Congress, and numerous proposals reflect this realization. I have been pleased that the question of financial assistance to students in the form of scholarships for higher education is again being considered.

I am aware of the most gratifying success of the student loan program which was established under one of the provisions of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. I think there is little doubt that this program has been enthusiastically accepted by institutions of higher education, and students and parents. For a large number of persons this program will solve a serious financial problem. For an equally large number of students, unfortunately, this loan program will not provide a solution to the problem of paying for higher education. Frequently these persons are not able to pursue college study on a loan because of their anticipated income resulting from their choice of work, or because of family responsibilities already assumed, or because of family responsibilities which they expect to assume immediately upon completion of studies, or numerous other factors which vary from individual to individual. Yet, who would deny that these individuals deserve the opportunity to benefit from a college education. It is these young people who present a special problem—it is these young people for whom a national scholarship program holds significance. And all too often, it is these young people who have some special ability, interest, or talent. This talent and ability or specialized interest must not go undeveloped.

In addition to the question of student scholarships, proposed legislation relating to higher education would also provide for the construction and expansion of public community junior colleges—H.R. 967; and income tax exemptions or deductions or credits for expenditures for higher education—S. 755, S. 926.

Still another factor affects the realization of the cherished American dream of education of high quality for as many as are qualified. This is the burden of the institutions of higher education who must accommodate their increased student enrollments while at the same time maintaining their high standards. The pattern of population growth and birth within the Nation during the past decade has resulted in the serious strain upon facilities and faculties in our colleges and universities. Today we enroll in our colleges and universities an average of slightly more than 3 out of 10 of our youth of college age. This proportion is rising along with our college-age population and the need for higher education. Our college enrollment is expected to double by 1967. Indeed, competent authorities estimate that by 1967 the full-time enrollment in our colleges and universities will have jumped from today's 3 million to 6 million students.

Our institutions of higher education are also faced with the problem of teacher shortage. A seriously inadequate salary scale is steadily reducing the number of qualified people who choose, and stay with, college teaching as a career.

The Council for Financial Aid to Education reports that college faculty members are among the lowest paid professional groups in the Nation, with an annual median salary of about $5,200. The council reports:

> This whole situation makes no sense. The average college professor's salary today, in actual purchasing power, is less than 70 percent of what it was in 1940. The average factory worker's purchasing power is now 150 percent of its 1940 value.
> At a time when good teachers are more vitally needed than ever, thousands of them are forced out of the colleges and into industry simply because they cannot make ends meet. One of the crying needs of higher education is to establish salary levels which will attract and hold larger numbers of men and women with a real talent for teaching.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that we must be earnestly concerned with a broad program for the enrichment of the minds and opportunities of our young people. Certainly there can be no better investment of public funds than this. Too often, I am afraid, we are content merely to talk about these needs like the barker in the local carnival who while making loud proclamations, seeks chiefly to fool the people. I would not maintain that a single bill would solve the problem in education or the problems of child welfare. There is no single panacea.

Instead, I would proclaim that the Federal Government has a very definite responsibility to fulfill if the States in these times of crisis would provide the best possible programs for education and welfare for the youth of this Nation. I further maintain that without a doubt, the actions of this 86th Congress will influence the direction of the Nation in these areas. Let us then be even more serious minded and even more determined to enact those legislative measures which will accomplish these purposes and which will provide for additional numbers of young people an expanded horizon of opportunity.

MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM P. FISHER

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the legislative scene here at the Capitol is always notable for the swiftly moving changes that occur. As further evidence of these changes, it is with regret that I note the reassignment of Maj. Gen. William P. Fisher, director of the Air Force's legislative liaison, who upon the 15th of September will assume command of the Eastern Air Force of the Military Air Transport Service.

General Fisher has distinguished himself by his able and clear presentation of the Air Force view upon the critical challenges which have faced this Congress enabling us all to have a new and greater understanding of these most important issues. In addition, General Fisher has performed a valuable service in providing us with the answers to many questions from our constituents relating to the Air Force.

It is with gratification that I note that General Fisher is proceeding to a command assignment for which his experience has so well fitted him. General Fisher commanded the 26th Bomb Squadron of the famed 19th Bomb Group at Clark Field in the Philippines when the Japanese attacked on December 7, 1941. Although wounded in this attack, he went on to command the 308th Bomb Group in China under the direct control of General Chennault. After the war and a period of staff duty, he was successively selected to command the 43d Bombardment Wing and the 36th Air Division. When the Korean war broke out he was the obvious choice to command the Far Eastern Air Force Bomber Command. During World War II and Korea, he flew 59 combat missions. For his outstanding and valuable services, General Fisher has received the Distinguishsed Service Medal, the Legion of Merit with three Oak Leaf Clusters, the Distinguished Flying Cross with one Oak Leaf Cluster, the Air Medal, Purple Heart, the Presidential Unit Citation with four Oak Leaf Clusters.

Before coming to his present assignment, he served as commander of the First Air Division of the Strategic Air Command and Deputy Commander of the Eighth Air Force. I believe that we in the Congress have been most fortunate to have had the assistance of a man who has successively distinguished himself in command of squadron, group, wing, air division, and Air Force, and while I regret to see him moving on, we may feel gratified that he is bringing this wealth of experience to the most important Atlantic operations of MATS.

WE MUST DISCOURAGE INTERNATIONAL CARTEL AND MONOPOLY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, one of the most interesting and important problems which the United States will encounter in the next decade is that of finding foreign markets for its industrial and agricultural products. This problem will, of course, become even greater as the United States turns to automation to improve its productivity and as our potential for and manufacture of complex domestic industrial machinery and consumer goods becomes greater while the level of consumer needs in the United States approaches something close to fulfillment.

The problems of distribution, which are, in fact, all there is to the meaning of finding markets, is not an easy task; and it is not made easier by various practices of international cartels and world monopolies which limit production, distribution, and competition of products. Restrictive business practices in the international scene are practices about which the United States has been cognizant for a very long time. Many sensitive observers of international trade and incisive American businessmen have long been aware of the fact that cartel arrangements function as detriments to economic development and progress.

As Dean Rostow of the Yale Law School pointed out in the report of the Attorney General's National Committee To Study the Antitrust Laws:

> Foreign monopolies, cartels, and restrictive arrangements of comparable effect are costly burdens upon the American economy. They affect certain prices within the United States either directly or by influencing imports into this country; and they influence, and often control, American export and investment opportunities in other countries. * * * While no estimates are available as to the proportion of world trade affected by cartels, there can be no doubt that they constitute a quantitatively significant influence on both actual and potential movements of goods, services, and capital in the economy of the free world. In the last 30 years, governmental reports alone have reviewed cartel plans with respect to more than 120 commodities or services of significance in world trade, including aluminum, diamonds, wood pulp, nickel, copper, rubber, various chemical and electrical products, dyes, cocoa, shipping, magnesium and machinery of many types.

American businessmen are beginning to feel the problem of restrictive business practices as they have never felt them before. The Randall Commission on Foreign Economic Policy stated—in one of its few unanimous conclusions—that the existence of restrictive business practices "will limit the willingness of U.S. businessmen to invest abroad and will reduce the benefits of investment abroad to the economies of the host country."

This awareness has been the basis of our public international economic policy since immediately after the Second War. The U.S. Government under President Truman took part in many important international conferences in order to work out a responsible program to rid international trade of the yoke of monopoly and cartelism.

For example, in 1951 the American Government introduced a resolution in the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations to establish an intergovernmental committee to make recommendations to the Council solely for the prevention and control of restrictive business practices in international trade. This resolution passed by a vote of 13 to 3. As was expected, the three negative votes came from the Soviet bloc. As a result of this resolution an able intergovernmental committee, composed of 10 countries, worked very hard for over a year to write a comprehensive and workable arrangement for an intergovernmental committee which would have the power of gathering information on various cartels and world monopoly arrangements from member nations, besides the power of investigating any complaints from member nations in order to ascertain the facts. After work on this draft was completed and it appeared to be acceptable to the United States, the United States changed its position early in 1953. It is clear that a switch in American policy at that time came as a result of a change in political administrations in Washington. There is little question that the State Department and the White House changed the American position on the insistence of a few strong opponents who happened to be billionaire cartelists. This opposition came from the oil and mining interests which have informal international cartel arrangements. These vain and selfish groups have rigged the price of the world oil and mineral production while dividing up the world into vast private oil and mining dynasties.

Thus, the United States, after taking the lead in this important area in world trade in order to break world monopoly beat a hasty retreat. This was done after we had convinced the heavily industrialized free nations of the world and the heavy trading nations of the importance of international exposure of cartels and world monopoly.

The American reversal of its position has had the effect of discouraging any kind of international action in the cartel field. Other nations that supported our position have been greatly discouraged by waning American enthusiasm. It should be pointed out, however, that many nations now have done much to encourage antitrust laws on a national basis as a result of our previous position in the United Nations. This, of course, is not enough, since cartels, like disease knows no national boundaries or individual loyalties.

Mr. Speaker, it is now eminently clear that the policy of the State Department in this area for the past 5 years has been one conceived in private interest and fraught with selfish folly. American businessmen, and consequently American labor and agriculture have suffered because of this policy. Private businessmen all over the free world have suffered, economic development in Asia and Africa has been slowed, the average world consumer has suffered because of this international price fixing.

Now is the time, before it is too late, to reestablish our policy of eliminating restrictive business practices in international trade. By so doing we are showing the world that we stand behind the idea of competition in international trade; that this notion is a basic precept of American economic life and not an empty slogan.

Mr. Speaker, the reaffirmation of our policy will show to our friends in Asia, Africa, and South America that we do not countenance restrictive and viper-like cartels that destroy economic development, depress wages and raise and freeze prices to the hindrance of both the buyer and the independent, competitive seller.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REQUESTING THE PRESIDENT TO INSTRUCT THE U.S. DELEGATION TO THE UNITED NATIONS TO SPONSOR AND SUPPORT RESOLUTIONS CURTAILING RESTRAINTS ON WORLD TRADE RESULTING FROM CARTELS AND OTHER FORMS OF WORLD MONOPOLY

Whereas the United States has a continuing concern with the existence in international trade of restrictive business practices which have harmful effects on the attainment of higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

Whereas the United States recognizes that national action and international cooperation is necessary in order to deal effectively with business practices affecting international trade;

Whereas the elimination of harmful restraints on international trade such as cartels or other forms of world monopoly and the furthering of competition in international trade continues to be a basic objective of this country's economic policy: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress requests the President of the United States to instruct the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, and to appropriate agencies of the United Nations, to sponsor and support resolutions that would assist the United Nations in establishing the proper intergovernmental machinery, and urging member Government participation, to implement a policy of elimination of harmful restraints on international trade resulting from cartels or other forms of world monopoly.

SERIOUS SITUATION IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it imperative that the House should take note of the increasingly serious situation building up in southeast Asia, particularly the events in Laos.

The ramifications of the ever-growing Communist pressures now being openly applied in this area are many, and none of them are pleasant for us to contemplate.

It is very clear to all that what we are seeing in Laos today is a renewed Communist effort to gain direct access to Thailand and Cambodia, flank South Vietnam and open the way to the remainder of southeast Asia. All of these dire results would flow from the fall of Laos.

It is incredible to me, as it is to many Americans, that even as we face this new threat, one in which the potential for grave disaster to the cause of the free world is as great as any we have faced, the Pentagon refuses to follow the mandate of this Congress and ready our forces best suited to act in this situation.

Certainly it is a matter of general recognition that the U.S. Marine Corps constitutes the very first echelon of our forces most capable, most carefully designed, to meet the repeated open threats of the cold war.

I, of course, have no way of knowing if there is any plan even in existence to employ Marines in Laos should that situation continue to deteriorate. Nor is it my intention to recommend that we do so.

Instead, it is my purpose to call attention to what can only be considered by all thinking citizens one more example of the strange lack of wisdom and dearth of good judgment in the Pentagon in failing to provide adequate forces to cope with the very type of situation which is rapidly building up in southeast Asia.

The Congress, I submit, has more correctly evaluated the nature of the threat posed by the repetitive overt pressures and incursions of the Communist empire. We have provided again this year for a minimum strength Marine Corps of 200,000 Marines.

Yet, even as the events in southeast Asia daily provide a worsening, ever darker picture, a Pentagon bemused by ICBM's and near tragic fascination with the "bigger bang for the buck" has stripped the Marine divisions and air wings of battalions and squadrons of combat-ready Marines.

Not even the 3d Marine Division on Okinawa, the only combat-ready ground force we have in Asia, has escaped the cuts imposed by the Pentagon's unreasoning, illogical insistence upon ignoring the expressed intent of Congress on what constitutes an adequate Marine Corps.

Can it be that the cutting of this combat ready force of Marines, so symbolic to friends and foes alike of our determination to stand by our allies, has in itself encouraged to some extent the renewed outbreak of Communist aggression in Laos? Certainly the deactivation of combat units within this single American ready force in the Far East does nothing to discourage the evil aspirations of the Communist.

Logic, common sense, prudence support the congressional direction to the Department of Defense to maintain the Marine Corps at a strength adequate to the proven need. Each passing day but confirms the soundness of our decision and exposes further the lack of sound planning in the Pentagon for the means to meet the known pattern of Communist conquest by piecemeal.

Every single experience we have encountered in the past decade has proven the inability of massive retaliation to deal with the familiar Communist tactic now again unfolding before our eyes in southeast Asia.

Just as clear is the fact that every successful reaction we have made over the years has been based upon the readiness, availability and versatility of the very forces now cut to the bone.

I call upon the Secretary of Defense to commence immediately effecting the congressional intent on Marine Corps strength; to provide at the earliest possible moment with the funds and resources the Congress has made available a Marine Corps adequate to the national interests—a Marine Corps of 200,000.

AN OPEN RULE IS NEEDED ON THE HIGHWAY BILL TO PERMIT A FISCALLY RESPONSIBLE AMENDMENT REDUCING THE OIL DEPLETION ALLOWANCE

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] may extend his remarks at this point in the body of the RECORD and to include therein extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, earlier today I appeared before the Committee on Rules to urge an open rule on the highway bill, H.R. 8678.

I did so in the interest of fiscal responsibility.

It was my intention to offer a fiscally responsible amendment to the highway bill, reducing the oil depletion allowance.

As a substitute for the bill's proposed diversion of funds to highway purposes from the general fund, my amendment would raise the necessary $2.4 billion through a reduction in the oil depletion allowance.

I support the bill's fiscally responsible provision to increase the Federal gasoline tax by 1 cent a gallon for 22 months. But the second financing section in the bill, to divert to the highway fund a large part of auto and auto parts excise taxes for a 3-year period, is not fiscally responsible. Reducing the 27½-percent oil depletion allowance to 15 percent for those whose oil and gas income exceeds $5 million annually, and to 21 percent for those whose oil-gas income is between $1 million and $5 million a year, will produce the same proceeds as the proposed diversion from the general fund, but will be fiscally responsible.

Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the Committee on Rules has now recommended a closed rule for H.R. 8678, and that the matter is to be taken up on Thursday by the House. I regret that I shall have to oppose the rule. I shall continue to seek the opportunity to offer my fiscally responsible amendment.

At this point in the RECORD I insert the statement which I made today before the Committee on Rules and the text of the amendment which I have prepared:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE HENRY S. REUSS, OF WISCONSIN, BEFORE COMMITTEE ON RULES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WITH RESPECT TO H.R. 8678, FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1959, SEPTEMBER 2, 1959

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Committee on Rules to recommend an open rule for the consideration of H.R. 8678.

Since both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Public Works have had such difficulty agreeing on the language of this bill, and since, so I understand, the bill has been agreed on in committee by the closest of votes, I believe that the rule for consideration of H.R. 8678 should be a liberal one, so that the House will have the opportunity to consider at least several of the alternatives that have been offered with respect to continuing the Federal-aid highway program, and particularly with respect to the financing of the program in the immediate future.

Mr. Chairman, I know that every member of the Committee on Rules and every Member of the House wishes to be fiscally responsible. Sometimes, when a variety of conflicting proposals arise, such as on this highway issue, and it is necessary to weld several proposals into one to get a bill out of committee, the result can be something less than fiscally responsible.

The compromise highway financing proposal contained in H.R. 8678 is, in my opinion, an example of this kind of compromise.

It proposes to increase the Federal gasoline tax by 1 cent for a 22-month period, and that is fiscally responsible as far as it goes. It also proposes to take from the general fund for a 3-year period one-half of the 10-percent manufacturers' excise tax on automobiles and five-eighths of the 8-percent excise tax on auto parts and accessories. It is this part of the proposal that seems to me not fiscally responsible, since it would divert some $800 million a year from the general fund, with no provision for replacement. Surely now is the time to avoid future budget deficits.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly want the Federal-aid highway construction program to proceed as nearly on schedule as possible, but surely this is the kind of a program that should be on a pay-as-you-go basis.

The President's original proposal for a 1½-cent increase in the gasoline tax would do this, all right, but would, in my opinion, be inequitable in that it would throw the whole burden of financing the program deficit onto the automobile and truck user.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that H.R. 8678 will reach the floor of the House under such circumstances that I shall be able to offer a fiscally responsible financing program, in place of section 202 which diverts funds from the general fund.

In essence my proposal is to raise the needed additional funds by reducing the oil depletion allowance in accordance with an equitable formula originally developed by some of our colleagues in the other body. I would reduce the depletion allowance from 27½ percent to 15 percent for those whose income from oil and gas properties exceeds $5 million a year; to 21 percent for those whose income is between $1 million and $5 million a year; and make no reduction for income under $1 million.

This reduction, coupled with the 1-cent gasoline tax boost for 22 months, would, according to reliable estimates, raise the same amount for the highway fund between now and June 30, 1964, as would the provisions of H.R. 8678.

The depletion allowance reduction, at an estimated yield of $500 million annually, would produce $2.4 billion by June 30, 1964. This is precisely the amount estimated to be produced under the plan for a 3-year, $800 million diversion from the general fund.

Mr. Chairman, I think the oil industry has a huge stake in the continuation of the highway program, and that it is not only fiscally responsible but eminently fair and equitable to raise the needed highway funds not only from the highway user in the form of a 1-cent gasoline tax boost, but from the oil industry in the form of a depletion allowance reduction.

I believe the Members of this House should have the opportunity to vote on such a proposal, and I therefore urge a rule on H.R. 8678 which will permit my amendment to be offered, along with others.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, at its recent national convention in Grand Rapids, AMVETS presented our distinguished colleague from Missouri, Senator SYMINGTON, with its first defense award in "recognition of exceptional contributions to the defense of the United States and the free world." I can think of no one more deserving of this recognition than Senator SYMINGTON. In its citation, AMVETS points out that Senator SYMINGTON "has brought to the Senate unique understanding of the times in which we live." I concur wholeheartedly with this statement and with the other commendations in the citation.

I ask unanimous consent that the citation be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with an excellent address which Senator SYMINGTON delivered before the AMVETS convention.

There being no objection, the citation and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMVETS NATIONAL CITATION

The 14th Annual National Convention of AMVETS, assembled in St. Louis, Mo., on August 22, 1958, unanimously resolved that its first defense award be presented to the Honorable STUART SYMINGTON, U.S. Senator, in recognition of exceptional contributions to the defense of the United States and the free world.

Throughout his outstanding career, the Honorable STUART SYMINGTON has contributed exceptionally to the national strength of the United States. He has consistently emphasized to the Government and the public the necessity for impenetrable national defense, as a threat against aggression and to successfully counteract aggression should it occur. Senator SYMINGTON continues to protect the United States and the free world through his active participation on the important Senate Armed Services Committee and Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee.

Senator SYMINGTON, who in 1958 was elected to the U.S. Senate by the highest percentage of votes cast in the history of Missouri, has brought to the Senate unique understanding of the times in which we live. His is the voice of a dedicated American with exceptional knowledge of current military needs. His is the voice of authority on national defense. His is the voice of authority on airpower. His is the voice of authority on defense reorganization.

Senator SYMINGTON's brilliant service as the Nation's first Secretary of the Air Force was responsible for many of the initial and subsequent contributions which the Air Force has made to the defensive strength of the United States and the free world. Earlier, the devoted public servant enhanced national welfare as Assistant Secretary of War for Air, Chairman of the Surplus Property Board, and Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

AMVETS and the United States—and the free world which looks to America to help preserve its freedom—are deeply indebted to the Honorable STUART SYMINGTON. It is with the greatest pride and appreciation that AMVETS present to him their first national defense award.

Presented August 27, 1959, AMVETS 15th Annual National Convention, Grand Rapids, Mich.

W. E. BURDINE, M.D.,
National Commander.
P. E. HOWARD,
National Executive Director.

THE PROTRACTED PSYCHOLOGICAL CONFLICT

(Address by Senator STUART SYMINGTON before the AMVETS National Convention, Grand Rapids, Mich., August 27, 1949)

It is a great privilege to be with you here in Grand Rapids at this national convention of the AMVETS.

Your organization is unsurpassed in its efforts towards adequate national defense.

Those in Government charged with responsibility in this field depend upon groups such as yours to keep our citizens both informed and alert about whether or not the strength of this Nation is adequate enough to insure our remaining a free people.

National defense is not just physical defense. It involves far more. It is the whole of our effort to keep the peace. It includes economic growth, scientific progress, the state of our morale and the quality of our education.

AMVETS does a magnificient job for its veteran members. But when it branches out—exploring the meaning of Americanism; granting scholarships; helping make better communities; speaking out for the legislation in which it believes—then your great organization makes its complete contribution to our overall security.

In the 15 years since its founding, AMVETS has grown steadily in stature.

And now you stand a vigorous, far-reaching, forward-looking organization, dedicated always to the welfare of our country.

In these 15 years this Nation has matured and expanded under the continuing challenge of world communism. We have disarmed, and armed again; forged great alliances; begun to build up underdeveloped areas; and learned some of the patience which must go with leadership of the free world.

Now we enter a new phase. In less than 3 weeks, Premier Khrushchev will come to this country.

It is hoped that he will leave these shores without incident—and with a better understanding of our basic strengths.

But it would be a tragic error to believe that his visit connotes any shift in Communist goals or strategy.

The Sino-Soviet Empire is committed to a single objective. They seek it at times by talk of peace, at times by war; in one place through professed efforts towards peace; in another by subversion.

But the basic goal is always the same: namely, the overthrow of parliamentary government, all over the world—resulting in their rule of all people.

We seem now to be headed for a phase which will be marked by increasing contact between communism and free peoples.

This means an increasing competition of words, ideas, and performance; and it is about this—what I would call the psychological side of the conflict—that I would speak briefly today.

The Russians are ready.

In his speech to the Second Congress of the Communist International, back in 1920, Lenin said: "Great are the military victories of the Soviet Republic, but still more significant is the victory over the minds and hearts of the masses, the victory of Communist ideas all over the world."

Following Lenin's advice, the Communists have developed the most effective machinery and the most refined strategy of propaganda the world has ever known.

Their assault on the mind takes many forms. It may be a peace congress in Sweden, a youth festival in Vienna, a strike in Paris, or a fair in New York.

Wherever it is, and whatever it is, you can be sure it is a well-planned monolithic effort, with the inspiration coming primarily from two places—Moscow and Peiping.

In this area of protracted psychological conflict the Communists are believed to be spending between $2 and $3 billion a year. It is an effort which has but one purpose—to drum home the Communist line, so as to soften up any opposition, as they move on with their plans for conquest.

But deeds are stronger than words; and the most ingenious propaganda is weakened if belied by actions.

This is what happened recently in Hungary, and even more recently in Tibet.

And that is why, despite the scope of the Communist effort, it is they, not us, who are vulnerable in this propaganda field at this time—if only we will shed the current complacency and go to work.

Greater effort in the psychological field could draw rich dividends for the cause of freedom.

Behind the Iron Curtain—in the so-called zone of peace in which we now let Communist rule go unchallenged—the people are nevertheless stirring.

Ideas of freedom have seeped through the blockade of indoctrination and thought control.

Why else would 250,000 Poles turn out to cheer the Vice President of the chief capitalist nation of the world?

Why else would 1 out of every 10 East Germans have left their country since 1950, drawn by the symbol of freedom which is West Berlin?

Yes; dissent and doubt are on the rise in many places behind the curtain.

Let me tell you a story, the authenticity of which is vouched for by the distinguished free Austrian magazine, Forum.

At the time of the Hungarian revolution 140 students were expelled from a Moscow university.

Their crime? In the middle of a class on Marxism they began to ask why, in Hungary, workers and peasants had risen against the Communist state.

The Russian students were not satisfied with the answer of their teachers, so they went to the rooms of Hungarian students and literally dragged them out of bed to ask some searching questions.

They wanted to know whether the Communist Party has not in fact become the exploiting class Marx warned against; and, if this were true, whether Marxist theory would not demand that the people revolt against the party.

These discussions spread to other Russian universities, where the question was even asked whether "the Russian workers, under Lenin's banner, will not rise against their bureaucratized exploiters."

Only extreme subsequent disciplinary measures quieted this outbreak of criticism. But the incident shows that, after 40 years of control, the Communists would seem to have failed in the indoctrination of some of their youth.

With wise and careful effort, we can carry on this battle of ideas behind the lines to great advantage.

We should utilize holes that have been opened up in the Iron Curtain to intensify our efforts to win converts to freedom's cause.

The crucial weapons of such an effort, I am glad to say, cost nothing.

They need no lead time, because we have them.

They are not subject to mechanical failures.

And they have not grown obsolete in 183 years.

They are parts of our life which many of us take for granted. But translated into the lives led by the people behind the Iron Curtain, they become concepts of great motive power.

First of course is the idea of freedom. The Iron Curtain people should know that if they lived under our system, they would be able to walk the streets without identity cards. They could move to a new city without registering with the police. They would be able to apply for the kind of job they wished, instead of being assigned by the state. They could read, think and speak what they pleased.

And then there is self-determination—people being free to choose their own form of government, without pressure from foreign troops on their soil; living in a land where men can choose their own government representatives in free elections.

Also there is the concept of material well-being—better pay, better working conditions, a better standard of living.

How interested these men and women would be to study the way we in America have narrowed the historic gap between rich and poor without revolution or bloodshed.

Why should we fear increasing contact between the Communists and ourselves? Their way of life has no attraction for us. But our way of life has much attraction for them.

The more they learn about how we live, the more they will realize that the free world has actually delivered the better life which the Communists promise.

Why is it that the truth about the West is so largely unknown behind the Iron Curtain?

A few comparisons can answer much of that story.

In the last year, while the Russians were spending billions in psychological warfare, our total effort in this field amounted to less than $150 million.

That is about 3 hours' output of 1 day of our annual income.

We have the weapons to lead the world to peace. But we neglect the means of delivery.

Therefore, I recommend a four-point program to help our country mount a new major offensive in this battle for men's minds.

First, there should be intensification of our radio broadcasting behind the Iron Curtain, our presentation of the truth about America.

We should be able to broadcast long enough, loud enough, and on enough channels to break through Communist jamming efforts.

We should not raise false hopes in the hearts of people—but we should keep constantly before them the difference between their life now, and the life they could have under freedom.

Second, we should increase personal contacts between Communist and free world peoples—through travel, letters, and exchange programs.

The young Americans serving as guides at the Moscow Fair have reported that their own personal views and experiences about life in the United States are a most effective counter to Communist propaganda.

Third, there should be better preparation of our Foreign Service people for jobs abroad. We cannot get over our message to another land or person if our representatives do not know the language. They cannot be effective unless they understand the culture and customs of the country in question.

Far too many of our representatives abroad are not properly equipped for their job. It was for this reason that I proposed the establishment of a Foreign Service Academy, to train the free world advocates of a lasting peace so they could present their message with maximum effect.

Finally, there should be a much more effective use of religion as an antidote to communism.

Eighty percent of the people held in bondage behind the Iron Curtain are Christians.

A large percentage of them are devout; and therefore, when their beliefs rub against the atheistic policies of their Communist rulers friction is automatic.

We have not yet made full use of our creeds and religious convictions as a weapon in this cold war. Through broadcasts, we could do much more in emphasizing the strength of our faith.

These broadcasts should stress the dignity of man under God, along with other religious ideals incompatible with Communist doctrine.

Why not, for example, translate and dramatize some of the outstanding religious broadcasts we hear on our own networks every Sunday.

I present these opportunities and suggest how we might use them. At this point, however, let me make it clear that I do not suggest stirring up any revolution.

But we do want to spread the truth, for there is a good chance that this truth will spread dissatisfaction, and thereby force some relaxation of Russian rule, in terms of more understanding and therefore more good will.

The head of the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Allen Dulles, asserted in a recent speech that while the Soviet Government is still a closely regulated autocracy, it is not today quite as free as under Stalin to disregard wholly the desire of the people.

This applies at least as much to the Soviet satellites. They would be grateful for the slimmest ration of the fruit of freedom.

If we can help them to that end, all our effort will have been worthwhile—and the goal of peace will be much nearer to mankind.

First Hungary, and then Tibet, have shown the Communists that if control of their satellites is based on force alone, they damage their cause in the uncommitted nations.

And by spreading our ideas, and ideals, we can stimulate apprehension in the countries they still do not control; plus unrest in the countries they do.

Such possible progress through truth can only reduce the Communist threat to our own security.

As our country heads into the uncertain future, testing new methods of diplomacy, facing new techniques, I have faith that this great organization of AMVETS will support these efforts, efforts essential for our security, our prosperity, and the greatest of all blessings, a just and lasting peace.

Communist Propaganda in Asia

OF

HON. CHESTER BOWLES

OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement:

The Speaker has generously granted permission to me to exhibit in the Speaker's lobby of the House of Representatives several samples of Communist propaganda typical of that now being disseminated in the Middle East and in south and southeast Asia. This exhibit is designed to acquaint Members of Congress with the scope, breadth, variety, skill, and effectiveness of Communist propaganda in this area of the world and with the corresponding challenge it presents for American policy.

Among the aspects of this challenge, highlighted in the exhibit, are the following points:

First. Propaganda from the Soviet Union and Communist China is supplementary in various fields and in different countries. Chinese propaganda, for instance, appears more often in Pakistan, which is at odds with the Soviet Union, while the Soviets are more active in Burma, where the Chinese are regarded as a direct threat. A major role is also given to propaganda from countries of central and eastern Europe, particularly in the sphere of cultural and economic affairs.

Second. Soviet and Chinese publications are attractive, and present life under communism in terms designed to appeal to the workers and peasants of most of non-Communist Asia. China alone sold an estimated $1 million worth of propaganda material at cutrate prices out of Hong Kong last year.

Samples of direct propaganda publications include:

From China: China Pictorial, China Reconstructs, Women of China, People's China.

From U.S.S.R.: The Soviets distribute New Times, Soviet Literature, Soviet Union, Soviet Land, Soviet Weekly, Soviet Woman, Culture, and Life.

From central and east Europe: Romtrans—Romanian Industry—Czechoslovak Life, Bulgarian Foreign Trade, GDR Review (East German), Do You Know the Rumanian Peoples' Republic?

In the middle east Communist French publications such as Democracie Nouvelle are available.

Asian Communist countries, such as North Korea and North Vietnam distribute their own magazines.

Third. The official Communist propaganda pamphlet campaign is accompanied by standard literature. Russian classics are constantly being reprinted in English. Indeed, more publications in English are now being printed behind the Iron Curtain for distribution in non-Communist Asian countries than are being printed for such purposes by the United States and Great Britain combined.

Each year, scores of new titles in Hindi, Bengali, and Urdu and other national languages are also released. "Handbooks on Marx," "People's China, U.S.S.R.," "Chinese Cooking and Chinese Papercuts," are on sale everywhere, as is the Constitution of the Soviet Union in nearly all languages. Important pronouncements and interviews with Soviet leaders are widely distributed.

Books and albums are published in China and Moscow on the visits of Soviet leaders to other Asian countries. Publications on Islam and Buddhism are frequently distributed.

Communist propaganda aims at filling gaps in available literature wherever such gaps exist. Thus there is much concentration on children's books such as "The Silver Hoof," "Frisky Kitten," "Ukrainian Folk Tales," and a series of "Peace Fables"—published in Bucharest.

Indian art publications are published in Moscow and distributed in India. Many art postcards sold in India are printed in Moscow.

This Communist propaganda effort through books and periodicals is, of course, only one arm of a sustained, long-term program. That program also includes the persistent use of radio, press, films, trade fairs and cultural missions. The following brief summary indicates the extent of some of these supplementary activities:

Radio: Communist Chinese broadcasts number 242 hours per week in 10 Asiatic languages and 5 Chinese dialects. Chinese abroad numbering 30 million are considered as an important target and instrument for Communist propaganda. Moscow broadcasts much more extensively—8 hours weekly to southern Vietnam for instance, 35 hours weekly to Persia, and an unspecified number in Hindi, Bengal, Urdu, Tamil, Telegu, Singhalese, and other Asian languages.

Press: The actual Communist press in Asia is not very extensive—six papers in India, two in Pakistan, four in Ceylon and five in Japan. But Soviet and Chinese propaganda is carried on (a) through local press agencies which distribute news issued by Tass and the New China Agency, and (b) via extensive distributions of Chinese and Soviet publications in French, English and all Asiatic languages.

Films: Great emphasis is placed on presenting Communist films in Asia. Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Hungary make particular efforts in this field. In addition, Polish-Indian, Hungaro-Indian, Soviet-Indian film companies have been created and are discussing joint productions. The Soviet Union produced the national film "In Pakistan" and the so-called Indian monumental "Pardesi."

Trade fairs, cultural, scientific, and sport exchange missions between Asian countries and the Communist bloc have been considerably increased. The Soviet Union and China have their pavilions at all trade fairs such as the Indian Fairs at Hyderabad or Bombay, or in Pakistan's Lahore Fair. So have east European countries. Presently in Cairo and Bombay there are Czechoslovak, Hungarian, Romanian, Bulgarian, Polish and East German industrial shows. Czechoslovak string quartets and Rumanian dance teams, East German sport teams and Chinese wrestlers visit the majority of Middle East and Asian countries. Communist teams are present at all Asian festivals. Chinese Buddhist art exhibitions tour Ceylon, India, and Burma.

The single, overall conclusion of any current survey of Communist propaganda in Asia is its formidable continuity of purpose. It is a long-term effort, being conducted with purpose and skill. It is not calculated to achieve dramatic or immediate success, but rather long-term impact in depth.

The importance of Asia to Communist strategy is obvious. America's stake in the future of free Asia is equally clear. We will need new thinking and new responses if this challenge is to be met effectively in the months and years ahead.

I hope that this exhibit in the speaker's lobby will help broaden understanding of the nature of this challenge. In the preparation of this material for exhibit, the International Federation of Free Journalists was most helpful, and I gratefully acknowledge their cooperation. I hope that as many Members of Congress as possible will see this exhibit during the next few days.

Passage of Des Plaines Wildlife Area Legislation Vital to Illinois Recreation

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an item of legislation, H.R. 3894, which may die in committee in these last few days of the session and upon which action should be taken without further delay.

This bill directs the Army and the General Services Administration to transfer to the State of Illinois approximately 2,400 acres attached to the Joliet Arsenal grounds as wildlife hunting, game preserve, and recreational area adjoining the Des Plaines and Kankakee Rivers. This 2,400 acres should provide not only a wildlife and game preserve but also a fine recreation ground.

The Army, however does not wish to give up any rights to the 1,500 acres south of the present preserve and wants to substitute another area of the present preserve. This substitute area has been carefully inspected and pronounced to be totally unsatisfactory. The Army argues that it needs the other area for military maneuvering purposes. Even without the 4,000 acres in question, the Army would have 39,000 acres for maneuvers. It would seem to me that the Army could do some pretty extensive maneuvering in 39,000 acres.

It would be a shame for Congress to adjourn without concurring with the Senate action on this bill which is not only in the interest of the citizens of Illinois but concerns everyone interested in the preservation of our Nation's public recreational areas.

The Right to Travel

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement which I made before Senator ERNEST GRUENING's Subcommittee on Passport Legislation on September 1:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES O. PORTER, DEMOCRAT, OF OREGON, BEFORE THE U.S. SENATE GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE ON PASSPORT LEGISLATION, SEPTEMBER 1, 1959

It is my opinion that the Secretary of State does not have and should not be given powers to prevent an American citizen, Member of Congress or not, from visiting any country in the world. Unless we are actually at war, American citizens should be freely allowed U.S. permission to visit all countries. A passport should be only an identification. Its issuance should be an almost entirely clerical act, not a question of executive discretion to be decided in terms of foreign policy considerations.

Some of the legislation under consideration by this committee was requested of the Congress by the President of the United States July 7, 1958, to authorize the Secretary of State to refuse passports for travel in designated countries or areas. From the Executive's point of view there may seem to be advantages to this but, in my opinion and as in the case of many other restrictions on freedom, the disadvantages are far greater.

Four alleged advantages are set forth in a letter dated July 2, 1959, which I received from Assistant Secretary of State William B. Macomber, Jr.

The first advantage listed had to do with the emergency declared in 1950 and which is still in effect. This means there is a state of unresolved conflict between Communist China and the United States. I fail to see how restricting travel by U.S. citizens assists us in resolving this cold-war type of conflict in our favor. On the other hand I can conceive of improved relations resulting from such visits. However, the Department of State itself has granted permission to 41 U.S. journalists to travel in China. This seems to recognize the fact that the cold war is best fought through an increase of information and understanding. Our motives are good. We plan no aggressions. We truly want peace, freedom, and improved living conditions for the people of the world. To ban travel is to cut off effective personal communication. This lessens the opportunities for the understanding which must be the basis for any real peace.

Second, it is alleged that the United States can't provide the customary protection in these areas, the governments of which we don't recognize. There are many risks a U.S. citizen still takes without the aid of the protective arm of his Government. A citizen going to the Dominican Republic takes the usual risks in a police state of becoming a casualty, something which our diplomatic representatives there can neither prevent nor mend nor readily punish. All that the State Department should do in such circumstances is make certain that the citizen contemplating a trip to a police state understands the risks he faces.

Third, in the case of China, such restrictions are supposed to punish, or at least indicate our disapproval of, the Chinese Communist Government for maltreating and holding as hostages our citizens. This is on the erroneous assumption that our refusing permission to our citizens to visit China hurts or at least demeans them more than it handicaps us in seeking both peace and facts. I feel that we would secure the release of the five remaining U.S. prisoners far sooner if we permitted wider interpersonal communications between our country and Communist China.

Fourth, the State Department refers to what it terms an "important factor," the effort of the Communist Chinese to utilize trade and cultural contacts to promote political objectives hostile to our interests. We can hardly hope to win the cold war if we refuse to join battle on the trade, cultural and other fronts. Indeed, with respect to the Soviet Union, by far our major opponent, we carry on, amid almost universal applause, an extensive program of visitor exchanges. The President's recent decision to trade visits with Khrushchev is a dramatic affirmation of the President's belief that such contacts can aid the cause of peace.

We cannot rely on increased communication alone to guarantee peace. It is even more clear that the willful ignorance or any variety of iron curtains makes war more probable.

Every American citizen who travels abroad is an ambassador. Most are good ones. Some are not. All learn things which they bring back to be evaluated. Enemy stereotypes are blurred by facts and obliterated by understanding.

The peoples of the world don't want war. If informed, they can be powerful drags on imperialistic ambitions of their rulers. Ordinary person-to-person contacts are the best way for human beings to form tolerant and friendly opinions of each other. Curtains between countries, whether of iron, bamboo, visas or passports, become black shrouds for the cause of world peace.

These are some of the reasons why American citizens should be permitted by their Government to travel anywhere. I also believe that this is part of the freedoms guaranteed to every American citizen. This question is for the judiciary to settle.

On August 27, 1959, I filed suit against the Secretary of State because he had refused to give me permission to travel in China. With the chairman's permission I shall file the text of this complaint at the conclusion of these remarks. A Member of Congress is in a somewhat different position from one who is not a Member. Secretary Macomber, in the letter cited above, wrote to me, "as a Member of Congress your visit would be interpreted throughout Asia as well as by the Communist Chinese as a basic change in policy at the very time when the Communists are engaged in liquidating the Tibetan revolt, threatening war in the Taiwan Straits, and showing increasing arrogance and contempt for international law and decency."

I see no necessity for an interpretation that the suggested change of policy would mean any softening of our attitude. Certainly no softening is justifiable. Red Chinese aggression in Tibet, Laos, and India should be dealt with firmly. No one is suggesting that we forgive or forget Korea.

My visit to China, or the visits of other Members, should be characterized to the world as fact-finding missions with no such overtones, just as the Eisenhower visit to the Soviet Union cannot be accurately interpreted as meaning that we have forgotten or forgiven the slaughter in Hungary.

It seems to me there is a more pertinent difference in the case of the Member of Congress who seeks permission to go to China or any other country. This has to do with our keystone governmental doctrine, the separation of powers. The executive cannot, it seems to me, forbid a member of the legislative branch to visit any country with which we are not actually engaged in war. My lawsuit against the Secretary of State seeks a judicial decision on this question.

Moreover, since the State Department has seen fit to give permission to travel in Communist China to 41 journalists, its refusal to permit a Member of Congress seems arbitrary and discriminatory.

Let me make it clear that I do not believe that my going to China is in itself of much importance. This is a test case and I am seeking to help open the way for a policy change which will permit others, far better qualified than I, to go. The harm done by the present policy is more apparent when we consider that the State Department's position also blocks travel by Senator MAGNUSON, the chairman of the Senate's Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Senator COOPER, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator ENGLE, and other Members in both branches. Every Member of Congress has a duty to inform himself on legislative matters and to work for national security, but of course the special constitutional role of the Senate with respect to foreign policy makes the State Department's obstructionism with respect to Senators all the more intolerable and unconstitutional.

My plans for a trip to China and the Far East always have included being accompanied by other Members of Congress, experts in the area and in trade matters, businessmen, and journalists. That I am the sole plaintiff against the Secretary of State does not mean I intended to go to China as a lone, self-appointed investigating committee. Specifically I want to learn what I can, firsthand, about the conditions and potentialities of trade, especially with Oregon.

Warsaw in Chains

OF
HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to many recent favorable reviews, here and in England, of a book recently published by Stefan Korbonski, entitled "Warsaw in Chains."

There has been of late much interest in recent political developments in Poland. Many Americans are having considerable difficulty in fairly assessing that situation. Vice President NIXON's recent visit to Poland and the unusually warm welcome given to him by the people of that Communist-controlled nation, serve to stress again the warm feeling of friendship to the United States by the Polish people.

The author, Stefan Korbonski, a lawyer by profession, was the political head of the huge Polish underground that fought gallantly under the exiled Polish leadership in London throughout the Nazi occupation. His experiences of personal arrests and escapes make fantastic reading.

I most warmly recommend "Warsaw in Chains" to those of my colleagues who would like to understand better the present situation in Poland and the developments of the last 20 years. It makes excellent and most educational reading.

Golden Dollars—Poets and Poetry

OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
OF ALASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, proof is readily available, and I shall supply it here, that Capitol Hill is inhabited not only by statesmen but also by poets, or, at least, versifiers.

Only recently the Members of the Alaska delegation in Congress, Representative RALPH J. RIVERS, Senator ERNEST GRUENING, and I sent to each Member of Congress a "golden dollar" supplied by the Fairbanks, Alaska, Chamber of Commerce and good for $1 in trade—in Fairbanks. These were "minted," or so our covering letter stated, in commemoration of Alaska's admission to the Union. Accompanying the letter sent to each Member of Congress was a rhymed presentation, a wonderful work of art, no less, from the mind and pen of Charlie Hughes, administrative assistant to Representative RIVERS. So that the whole wide world, or, at least, that part of it which turns to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for education and enjoyment, may have the benefit of reading Charlie Hughes' verses, I present them now:

Today we all holler for a good sound dollar,
A low-priced car and a no-wilt collar;
But, despite the advance of this thing "automation,"
We can't even return nickel beers to the Nation.

But up in the city of Fairbanks, Alaska
(A wonderful place, if people should ask ya),
The chamber of commerce has done something about
A fair return for what you put out.

In honor of Alaska's becoming a State,
And joining you all in the "south 48,"
They've minted a dollar that's worth a whole buck
In all sorts of merchandise, including "mukluk."

They've sent us a "golden dollar" for you,
In honor of statehood—a dream come true;
It comes to you with the chamber's good cheer;
But spend it in Fairbanks—it's no good here.

Mr. President, another "Charlie" has retaliated in rhyme. He is none other than my friend CHARLIE BOYLE, that is to say the Honorable CHARLES A. BOYLE, Member of the House of Representatives for the 12th District of Illinois. CHARLIE BOYLE responded to the gift of the "golden dollar" in these words:

Your "golden dollar" has been received
What will be done with it can't be perceived
Spending in Fairbanks will have to wait
For it looks like we're stuck in the "south 48."

With adjournment appearing not coming forth
We won't get a chance to journey north
But thanks anyway for your little token
Perhaps we can use it for the highway program.

Mr. President, the situation is getting out of hand. Poetry begets poetry. Before we are done with this we shall doubtless have a sufficient supply of the muse on hand for the publication of a book, or books. Even as I set about to leave my office to go to the floor to make sure that these enduring words were preserved in print for posterity, another stanza reached me, responsive to the "golden dollar" theme. This is from Congressman HOWARD W. ROBINSON of the 37th District of New York:

Thanks for the dollar—it's welcome you bet;
But my only problem is how to get
From here to Alaska—so please send the fare,
And I'll spring for the beers, when I get there!

The Aptuxcet Story

OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, a unique observance is taking place on September 5 and 6 in the town of Bourne, Mass., where I have my summer home and which is represented in the House by our colleague, Hon. HASTINGS KEITH.

The townspeople on these days will commemorate the establishment, in the year 1627, of the Aptuxcet Trading Post in the town of Bourne, on the banks of the Manamet River. It was here that the colonists of the Plimoth Plantation wrote and signed the first business contract in America, thus becoming the birthplace of American capitalism and free enterprise.

A replica of the trading post stands on the original foundations of the post. In 1627, an agreement was written setting up the trading post, by the colonists of the Plimoth Plantation. The written instrument gave certain of their number control of the trade, the purpose of which was to pay off the huge debt still owed to the London promoters of the Mayflower expedition, to transport more of their countrymen to Plimoth.

The observance on September 5 and 6 will be marked by a pageant at the post, depicting the historical events connected with it.

The significance of the event is that it was here that the system of free enterprise contracts had their beginning. The colonists built on a firm foundation. From this humble start the way of life established by these rugged settlers became the vehicle for the development of the economic strength which has made our country the greatest power in world history.

Remarks on Diversion of Water Issue

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my remarks on the diversion of water issue.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY BEFORE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES ON DIVERSION OF WATER ISSUE

Let us first get a little of the history involved in this water diversion. Since 1922, bills have been introduced in Congress to authorize the diversion. They were introduced mostly by Congressmen from the city of Chicago. The bills based their right for the diversion of water from Lake Michigan on the following grounds:

(1) Sanitation—for sewage disposal purposes.

(2) Public health—caused by contamination of waters of the Chicago River, the Chicago Sanitary District Canal, and the Illinois Waterway.

(3) Diversion would permit the generation of additional waterpower at the Chicago District Lockport plant.

(4) Fish life would be restored.

(5) It would eliminate damage by extremely high waters of Lake Michigan.

(6) Navigation requirements of the Illinois Waterway demanded additional diversion.

(7) Then there was the position that diversion should be authorized to take care of a variety of demands in the Mississippi River watershed.

Harry Truman once quoted Justice Holmes as follows: "A page of history is worth a volume of logic," so let us get at some of the historical facts.

The controversy originated between the years 1892 and 1900 when the Chicago metropolitan area cut a canal across the Continental Divide. Previously the Illinois-Michigan Canal was completed in 1848. This canal soon became polluted with sewage; and, finally, in 1887, the Commission studied three methods of sewage disposal and recommended as the most economical the discharge of the sewage into the Des Plaines River through a canal across the Continental Divide. The legislature took action and the sanitary district was created with power to handle the situation. At that time, the sanitary district embraced an area of 185 square miles—it now embraces 600 square miles.

Since the opening of the canal, the Chicago River has been reversed. Then, it flowed into Lake Michigan—now it flows away from Lake Michigan. The purpose of the canal was the disposal of sewage and the production of electricity, so the Court found.

In 1907, an application was made to do certain work on the Calumet-Sag Channel to increase the flow from Lake Michigan through said channel. But this was refused by the Secretary of War. In spite of this, the sanitary district went right ahead; so the United States brought suit in 1908. Then, another application of the district in 1913 was denied by the Secretary of War.

In 1908, pursuant to the amendment of the constitution of Illinois, development was begun of a project that would contruct powerplants, locks, bridges, and dams, starting at the water powerplant near Lockport to a point on the Illinois River near Utica; the justification therefore was that it would provide about $3 million a year from the use of water diverted from Lake Michigan for waterpower purposes.

Well, the diversion was made without the consent of the States bordering on the Great Lakes, and in defiance of the Federal Government. Temporary permits were granted from time to time by reluctant Secretaries of War on the plea that the district and Illinois had neglected or refused to install modern sewage disposal plants and that the health of the people would be impaired.

The sewage pollution continued to be offensive up through the years. In 1925, the U.S. position for injunctive relief was affirmed by the Supreme Court, although the Secretary granted a permit for diversion of 8,500 cubic feet—looking to a progressive reduction. Meanwhile, in 1920, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors of the United States, made a report stating, in substance, that Chicago was debarred from any claim for indulgence; that it had defiantly opposed the Government and was in open disregard of the law; and that they had expended money of their constituents in prosecution of unwise and illegal plans.

In 1927, the Court, having referred the action of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan to Special Master Charles Evans Hughes, who said that the district, in relying on the arguments with reference to the health of its people, had long delayed the subject of suitable sewage plants as a means of avoiding future diversion. Therefore, the district could not complain if an immediately heavy burden was placed upon the district because of its attitude and its course of action. The Court further required that the rights of the complainants be restored gradually; giving the district time to provide adequate means for disposing of the sewage. In other words, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Chicago Sanitary District, and the State of Illinois, must stop the illegal diversion (281 U.S. 179) and the Court observed that "the diversion of water for sewage disposal was held illegal."

In 1932, on the application of the States, including Ohio, the Court appointed a Special Master, Edward F. McClellan. He found that the causes of delay in obtaining approval of the contruction of controlling works in the Chicago River "are total and inexcusable failures of the defendants to make an application to the Secretary of War for such approval." The Court entered its decree and provided for "gradual reduction of the diversion of waters of the Great Lakes, St. Lawrence system through the Chicago drainage canal; the reduction should be down to 1,500 cubic feet per second by December 31, 1938."

Again, the district delayed and, in 1932, application was made by the complainants again for a special officer to see that the decree of April 21, 1930 (281 U.S. 696) was carried out.

In 1933, the Court enlarged its decree to provide that "the State of Illinois is required to take the necessary steps to complete adequate sewage disposal plants and sewers to the end that the reduction of diversion may be made at the times fixed in the decree." The sanitary district then demanded that the Federal Government purchase the canals, paying $90 million therefor. The engineer department reported against it and this started the flood of bills; beginning in 1937, in the 75th Congress, seeking authorization for increased diversion of water.

In the Supreme Court Decree of April 21, 1930, there was a requirement in paragraph 5 that the defendant's sanitary district file with the clerk of the court semiannually, on July 1 and January 1 of each year—beginning July 1, 1930—a report to the Court adequately setting forth the progress made in the construction of the sewage treatment plants and appurtenances outlined in the program. Also, it was to set forth the extent and effect of the operation thereof and the average diversion of water from Lake Michigan.

Again, the sanitary district failed to comply with this order. The last semiannual report was filed on January 2, 1939, which said that "the complete treatment of all sewage will not be possible until July 1939,"—although the district was required to complete construction of the facilities on or before December 31, 1938. In January 1940, an application was made again for more diversion. The Court said, in relation to the same, "Illinois has failed to show that it has provided all possible means at its command for the completion of the sewage treatment system as required by the decree and no adequate excuse has been presented for the delay." The Court appointed a special master again and he recommended that the petition of Illinois be dismissed. The Supreme Court upheld the master's report.

Again, in 1956, Illinois petitioned the Court for a temporary modification of the decree and the Solicitor General filed a memorandum on behalf of the Government, as amicus curiae; pointing out the interests of the United States with regard to the paramount power of Congress in relation to navigation and treaties between the United States and Canada which affect the total problem of diversion. The Court, on the application of the district, granted a petition for temporary increase of diversion to, and including, January 31, 1957, and extended it again to February 28, 1957 (352 U.S. 983).

HISTORY OF THE FIGHT IN CONGRESS

Since 1920, bills have been entered to increase the diversion. Twice President Eisenhower has vetoed bills; stating, in substance, that he was unable to approve the bill because:

(1) Existing diversions are adequate for navigation on the Illinois Waterway and Mississippi River.

(2) All methods of control of lake levels, and protection of property on the Great Lakes, should be considered before arbitrarily proceeding with the proposed increased diversion.

(3) Diversions should be authorized with reference to negotiations with Canada.

(4) The legitimate interests of other States affected by the diversions may be adversely affected.

In the 85th Congress, a bill providing for an additional diversion for 3 years was passed in the House, but failed in the Senate.

The Chicago district pressure has not been limited to bills in Congress. Applications were made to Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, with Secretaries of War and with various boards and commissions.

Now, it is evident that Chicago has no health problem. Back in 1940 it was claimed that diversion was necessary because the pollution in the Chicago drainage canal constituted a menace to health. The special master, after extensive hearings, held that there was no menace to health. We know very well that an additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet will not clean up the objectionable conditions in the Illinois Waterway as long as untreated, and partially treated, sewage and sludge is permitted to enter the waterway. The permanent solution is to keep pollution out of the Chicago area's waterways by enforcing State and district laws prohibiting the dumping of raw, or partially treated, sewage, chemicals, and other materials in the streams and waterways of the State of Illinois. Eminent sanitary engineers are agreed that the effluent (liquid residual which remains after complete treatment of the well of an operated sewage disposal plant of an activated-sludge of modern type) is a clear, odorless liquid—nonputrescible which requires no chlorination and in which fish can live. The sanitary district affirms that the effluent of its northside treating plant "is almost as clear as drinking water, and quite as harmless as it finally leaves the plant through an outlet and into and through an artificial channel which discharges into the Chicago River" (278 U.S. 367).

There is no claim that additional diversion is needed for navigation on the Illinois Waterway, or for navigation on the Mississippi River. In a recent report by the division engineer, he states that "commerce on the Illinois Waterway has increased from 1,600,000 tons, in 1935, to 21 million tons in 1955." Recent studies of present and prospective water requirement for navigation on the Illinois Waterway show that the authorized diversion of 1,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan is adequate to meet those requirements.

The Alton lock, which was provided by Public Law 500, will take care of any trouble during low water.

Now, the Supreme Court has made it pretty clear that it will not permit any additional diversion at Chicago until the district utilizes all practical means, other than diversion, to alleviate conditions complained of. The U.S. Public Health Service has indicated that there are measures which the sanitary district can take which would handle the situation: Sewage treatment through aeration or chlorination, or the combination of the two. (See Senate Subcommittee on Public Works hearings, 1958, p. 92.) Based on aeration, the first cost would be $2 million; annual cost $250,000. Based on chlorination, the first cost is not given; annual cost $550,000.

It is very evident that the reason the sanitary district urges additional diversion is to avoid the normal and usual sanitation costs which would be required in expanding its facilities. Away back in 1913, when application was made to Henry Stimson, Secretary of War, he stated:

"The demands for diversion at Chicago are based solely upon the needs for sanitation of that city. Every drop of water taken out of the lake necessarily tends to nullify costly improvements made under direct authority of Congress throughout the Great Lakes; and, it is manifestly said that, as long as the city is permitted to increase the amount of water which it may take from the lakes, there will be very strong temptation placed upon it not to take a more scientific—and possibly a more expensive—method to dispose of the sewage."

The Supreme Court on April 21, 1930, limited the amount of water that could be diverted from the Great-Lakes-St. Lawrence system to 1,500 cubic feet in addition to domestic pumpage (281 U.S. 696).

There are the House bill, the Senate bill, and the amended bill, all considered by the committee. A study of the bills indicates quite clearly that some fertile minds which drew the two amendments were trying to meet some of the arguments that were made. The Power Authority of the State of New York, when it accepted the licenses granted to it by the Federal Power Commission for the construction of the Niagara power projects, did so, relying on the decree mentioned above.

The Canadian Government and the State of New York will in the course of the next 3 or 4 years have completed the power projects at an expense of over half a billion dollars. By that time, the power projects will be in full operation and a diversion of 1 year will be felt, causing a loss yearly of over a million dollars in income. So there is no question that the power authority would be deprived of substantial legal rights.

As we have already stated, such a diversion in violation of the Court's decree and the legal treaties would justify the claims of Canada to divert all the water from the Columbia River.

Now the next question arises, Is there any need for a diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second for such a study? Senate Document No. 128 of the 85th Congress, 1st session, states: "Recent studies of present and prospective water requirements for navigation on the Illinois Waterway show that the authorized diversion of 1,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan is adequate to meet those requirements" (p. 48) and shows that losses would result from increased diversion to navigation, power development, and shore property interest. Further, that if the water were diverted, such study could not possibly demonstrate that the levels of the Great Lakes and the flow at Niagara and the St. Lawrence River would not be affected detrimentally—with adverse effects on navigation and power development. It would also show, if such diversion were made, increased power production at the sanitary district's plant at Lockport, Ill., saving the district money.

The U.S. Department of Health in its report of April 29, 1957, suggests the answer by means of chlorination and aeration.

Added diversion will not benefit navigation on the Illinois Waterway; it will affect adversely navigation on the Great Lakes. It will not solve the problem of sewage in the sanitary district. It will affect adversely the power authority and benefit the district power generation.

All these facts raise a Constitution issue of the power of Congress to authorize additional diversion. But if it should be constitutional—and only the Court can decide that—it certainly is unfair to injure the property rights of people in Michigan and Wisconsin and deprive navigation and downstream power interests of their rights solely for the economic benefit of the sanitary district.

Now that the Court has appointed a master, he should handle the matter. Perhaps it should be referred to the Commission under the authority of article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.

Certainly diversion is unnecessary. It involves the rights, obligations and interests of the United States and Canada, as well as the litigating States and the inhabitants thereof.

REASONS FOR DENYING DIVERSION

1. The legislation will jeopardize our friendly relations with Canada. Canada is the best friend we have got in the world. Besides that she's our best neighbor, our best customer.

The two notes which follow, which I ask to be printed at the end of my remarks, clearly demonstrate how inappropriate it would be for Congress to take action.

2. The Great Lakes watershed: Canada and the United States are trustees thereof. If the door is opened now a flood of requests will come to the Congress from other communities along the St. Lawrence and in other States. Already the Ohio communities have discussed taking from Lake Erie water to the Ohio River watershed, and recently a group of Texans has suggested that a pipeline be built to the Great Lakes to tap the water thereof.

3. The increase in diversion comes at a time when the Great Lakes are headed for a record low lake level. At a time when every inch of diversion accentuates great losses in shipping, hydroelectric power plants on the Niagara and St. Lawrence River and also the harbors of port cities.

4. We and Canada have put into the St. Lawrence development between us a billion dollars. The utilization of the Seaway requires high water levels. Chicago diversion will nullify, to some extent, the benefits derived from the St. Lawrence Seaway.

U.S. ARMY ENGINEERS REPORT

1. The Engineers have stated that a temporary 3-year diverison of 1,000 cubic feet per second would lower Lakes Michigan-Huron by five-eighths of an inch and Lakes Erie and Ontario would be lowered by three-eighths of an inch.

They also stated that an increased diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second at Chicago would affect the flow and production of power in the Niagara River, the St. Lawrence River and in the Illinois hydroelectric plants—having an adverse effect on hydroelectric energy evaluated at $408,000 to $918,000.

2. The permanent diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second would have the effect of lowering the levels in Lake Michigan-Huron, and the estimated annual average economic loss to the U.S. Great Lakes fleet would be $240,000.

3. The evidence of the chairman of the Power Authority of New York estimated by 1 year additional diversion at Chicago of 1,000 cubic feet per second the total loss to Canada and the power authority would be $1,142,000, and as was suggested, it is plain that H.R. 1 is designed to open the door to a permanent additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second.

4. There has been plenty of evidence to show that the port cities of the Great Lakes would sustain very substantial damages to their harbors and port cities if H.R. 1 were to become law. Every fraction of an inch of loss in lake levels to artificially lower the Great Lakes due to a diversion at Chicago, would cost the lake port cities thousands of dollars annually.

5. The lake carriers testified that an additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second at Chicago with the resultant lowering of the lake would result in a loss of approximately $2,500,000.

CONCLUSION

1. The waters of Lake Michigan are interstate in character.

2. Five States: Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Indiana, and Wisconsin in 1955 approved the so-called Great Lakes Basin Compact, but Illinois Congressmen, following in the steps of their predecessors, kept on pressing Congress, even though the Supreme Court has returned and recently taken action and again appointed a master.

3. There are some real nice questions of law involved:

(a) Does Congress have the power to authorize the transfer of huge quantities of water from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence watershed to the Mississippi watershed with substantial damage to the Great Lakes States, the municipalities located on the Great Lakes and their people?

(b) We believe—

(1) The Court in Wisconsin v. Illinois, 278 U.S. 367, has answered that question definitely. That it is beyond the power of Congress and the Federal Government, particularly when made to create an artificial waterway to divert water from one watershed to another.

(2) That the power in Congress goes to the constitutional provision to regulate commerce or navigation, and that sewage disposal or sanitation is not a legitimate object of legislation.

(3) Neither is the development of power at Lockport, Ill., a valid object under the Court's decision.

(4) Now that the Supreme Court has again appointed a master, it is the proper machinery to dispose of this matter.

(5) That the notes from Canada, with whom we have been at peace for 140 years, indicate a really substantial reason for Congress not to take action on this bill.

(6) That it is unconstitutional for Congress by additional diversion to prefer Chicago over the ports of the other States.

(7) That an additional diversion would work injury to the other States by depriving them and their citizens and property owners and property without the due process of law (278 U.S. 367).

(8) That, in accordance with the testimony of Colonel Nauman, of the Corps of Engineers, additional diversion is not needed on the 9-foot channel of the Illinois Waterway.

(9) That taking water from Lake Michigan and transferring it to another watershed to the detriment of the first watershed is neither just, legal, nor equitable.

(10) That the only permanent and effective way of cleaning up the drainage canal and the Illinois River is by keeping out of them any untreated, or partially treated, and other material that pollutes the water.

4. The International Joint Commission has definitely stated that if any increased diversion will have the effect of partially lowering the levels of the boundary waters, that it is not within the Congress to attempt to change the amount of the present authorized diversion. Under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, our two nations divested themselves of all authority over the boundary waters as far as raising, lowering, or diverting them were concerned.

Let me recapitulate. Aside from the question of jurisdiction and power of Congress in the premises, no necessity or justifiable excuse exists for increasing the diversion of water from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system through the Chicago drainage canal.

1. The Great Lakes are international waters and no additional diversion should be permitted without the agreement of Canada and the States bordering on the Great Lakes;

2. The Illinois Waterway has more than enough water to handle all of the traffic and freight available and last year handled about 22 million tons of cargo;

3. Additional water diverted from Lake Michigan would not stop any erosion to riparian property on the Great Lakes due to high waters and winds; other means to minimize such damages are effective;

4. The Great Lakes are now in the downward movement of the cycle, with Lake Michigan 5 feet lower today than in August of 1952, and the Great Lakes will have new levels for the next years;

5. Additional diversion will not clean up any objectionable conditions in the Illinois Waterway as long as the Sanitary District of Chicago and industries, municipalities, and individuals continue to dump raw or partially treated sewage, chemicals and other materials in the waterway;

6. Any additional diversion will result in large and continuing damages to the Great Lakes and municipalities on the Great Lakes and their peoples, as witnesses and the United States Supreme Court pointed out;

7. Chicago today has no health problem related to the diversion issue;

8. President Eisenhower in his veto message of September 3, 1954, and in his veto in 1956, set forth succinctly the reasons why additional water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago drainage canal should not be authorized by Congress. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 102, pt. 11, p. 15304.)

9. The State of Illinois has, as a matter of official State policy as evidenced in its adoption of the Great Lakes Basin compact, recognized the justice and desirability of settling the Chicago water diversion controversy by agreement among all of the affected States and Canadian provinces, and not by Federal legislation. President Eisenhower, in his September 1954 veto of the diversion bill, indicated that he approved of an agreement between the interested Great Lakes States before authorizing additional diversion.

How Long Can the Benevolent Philosophy of Foreign Aid Continue To Blind Us to the Reality of Its Failures?

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, reality is the only means of discriminating between the virtues of benevolence and the sin of misdirected charity.

The foreign aid program most certainly was conceived in a sincere sense of virtuous benevolence. Its history in recent years reflects a sense of indiscriminate charity. Millions of Americans who have been burdened with the expense of this program regard the realities of its colossal waste and failures as reason to bring it to an end either immediately or in the near future. Countless others seem to be willing to accept it as a permanent program for reasons varying from benevolence to the calculated desire to maintain allies. Hence foreign aid has become an issue of deep controversy and one which will more than likely culminate in its slow death if the increasing number of votes in opposition to the program continues in the Congress in the years ahead. By its very nature, foreign aid is doomed—perhaps within 5 years and possibly 10.

There are those who justifiably fear that this program must be continued as long as the world is engaged in a titanic struggle between the forces of capitalism and communism. Be that as it may, no conscientious legislator can view the colossal waste and failures, so vividly revealed in committee investigations, without deep reservations. Neither can any conscientious legislator simply look the other way and blindly assume that we cannot turn back to some path of good judgment in this area of international life.

The U.S. Comptroller General, Joseph Campbell, told a House committee investigating foreign aid earlier this year that military and other oversea spending agencies of the U.S. Government have had more money to hand out than they can judiciously plan and use. Certainly a man in this high position, whose competence has never been questioned, would make no such statement without fact and knowledge.

Just what are some of the things which prevent some Members of Congress from voting "Yes" on foreign aid appropriations? In a number of countries, for example, the major item of expenditure is for training and supplying of a native army. One of these places happens to be Laos, in southeast Asia, now the center of a Communist-inspired rebellion. Representative PASSMAN testified that we supplied funds for maintaining an army of 25,000, but that U.S. military inspectors have never been permitted to find out just what kind of an army does exist there, if any.

But even if no army exists, there is plenty of evidence that there are uniforms, warehouses full of them. Among the thousands of uniforms waiting to be worn there were sizes 44 to 46. Each one of these, it appears, could accommodate two Lao soldiers since the average Lao weighs about 115 pounds and is 5 feet 3 inches tall.

In one depot oversea investigators discovered a 20-year supply of WAC clothing. At another place 70,000 sets of new tire chains were left out of doors to rust. Enough of one ammunition item to last for 185 years was found at a supply base. A 45-year supply of 30-carbine ammunition was uncovered at a military school in another foreign country. Then there was a motor pool which revealed the hoarding of 44 tires for each truck there. U.S.-equipped factories to build airplanes for the personal use of officials, it was found, were getting part of the foreign aid money.

Aid to foreign countries includes the stationing of U.S. missions to supervise the distribution of the funds and materials. While these supervisors are powerless to control the stealing, they are not without power to live sumptuously themselves. The Comptroller General told of some goings-on in Pakistan. There, for 271 Americans, the United States sent 529 refrigerators costing about $105,800. Since the 271 included wives and children, it is obvious that for each American more than two refrigerators had been supplied. There were also 669 air conditioners valued at $135,600; 650 stoves at $47,100, and household furniture at $128,500.

To bolster an apparently unpopular Pakistanian Government and win its support from the people, the United States decided to build in that country an installation which would supply a billion gallons of water a day for irrigation. A Japanese firm was engaged to do the job and over a million dollars was appropriated. When the pump house was completed it was discovered that there had been insufficient study of the problems to be solved, that the pumps would not be able to withstand the silt and mud and that the whole project was therefore useless as it stood.

Of Burma, Representative PASSMAN said:

> When you go into a country and you cannot find any trace of any benefit from that program, you wonder what we did teach them while we were there.

After hearing how much has been poured into Okinawa and other Ryukyu Islands, Representative CONTE asked of a testifying general whether these moneys had gained us the support of the people of these U.S.-occupied Japanese islands. The general asked that his answer be kept off the record. It was:

Perhaps one of the most authentic and striking appraisals of foreign aid recently came through Max A. Thurn-Valsassins, a member of the Austrian finance ministry and a former consultant to the World Bank.

Our foreign aid, he says, is based on three idealistic assumptions that are peculiar to the United States: that it will help underdeveloped countries raise their standard of living, that this will make them more stable, and that this, in turn, will contribute to American security.

Europe—

He says—

may be just as conscious of the Russian threat. It may have just as much to lose if the underdeveloped countries fall under Russian domination. Yet, in Europe, economic development has not aroused the big popular concern that exists in America.

The reason is not lack of money, he says. Some European countries could now afford foreign aid programs of their own. Instead, they let the United States struggle along under its self-imposed burden.

It is inconsistent, he says, for Americans to think that they can foster free enterprise, which they regard as essential to rising production, by giving money to rulers who regard our aid only as an instrument for subjecting the productive forces of their countries to their political and ideological objectives. These rulers resent any conditions or supervision accompanying our aid, and without these reins the money will go to build up public ownership and State control—the same things Russia deliberately fosters with her aid.

Such a system—

He says—

is incompatible with western type political and legal institutions. Unless present policies are altered, these institutions will become progressively weaker. Their final collapse may mean the end of western influence.

What underdeveloped countries need first, he says, is not money; indeed many Latin Americans have been investing large amounts in the United States while their governments are crying for investment capital. What they do need, he says, is a legal and institutional framework which will repatriate local capital and attract new investment from abroad. Lack of capital, he says, is not the cause of underdevelopment; rather, it is the consequence.

Developing this framework, he says, will require time, tact, and patience. But without it, foreign aid will remain futile, and, once it is accomplished, foreign aid will probably be unnecessary. This logic will probably not appeal to foreign aid lobbyists who think that with a generous dose of dollar bills, they can mold Asians and Africans into the image of Americans.

In the final analysis, it might be said that the answer to an effective foreign aid program lies in its proper administration. Perhaps this is true. But, how can a nation administer a foreign aid program when it has little or no control over the distribution of such aid it renders once the gift has been made to another nation? One does not give gifts with the positive direction of their use by their recipients. If the United States has no control over the distribution of economic assistance, nor the right to investigate military assistance given to foreign nations, how can we possibly direct a successful foreign aid program? As a matter of fact, even if we were able to clean up the waste and corruption in the controlled phase of its administration, we would have no means of channeling the gifts of foreign aid to the areas of need. We cannot blindly place a label of benevolence on indiscriminate charity.

Trade Adjustment Legislation Needed

OF

HON. CHESTER BOWLES

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, the reciprocal trade agreements legislation has always had my enthusiastic support. For at least a generation it has been evident to most Americans that the lowering of tariff barriers must be systematically pursued if the United States is to measure up to the demands of world leadership economically as well as politically.

At the same time it has long seemed unfair to me to expect a certain few industries in this country to bear the major burden of our national trade policy. It cannot be denied that the economic reversals suffered by many communities have resulted from tariff reductions.

I believe it is the responsibility of this Congress to ease the adverse effects of our national trade policy on previously healthy sectors of our economy. I am deeply convinced that we should provide temporary assistance to those stricken industries, communities, and individuals that find aid necessary as they attempt to diversify or expand their economic base.

Today I have introduced a trade adjustment bill which I hope may help serve as a focus for discussion in advance of the reconvening of Congress in January.

The objective of the bill is not to subsidize the adversely affected communities and firms or to compensate them for injury. Instead its aim is to help them adjust to new conditions within the framework of our trade policy—either by assisting them to make more effective use of their present facilities or by aiding the development of new lines of production.

The area redevelopment bill passed by the Senate earlier in this session contained an amendment which would have been a first step toward such a program of trade adjustment. This amendment would have authorized governmental assistance for industries and communities as they adjust their productive activities to the new economic conditions created by the lowering of trade barriers. The amendment would have encouraged the President to use every governmental procedure presently available to facilitate the adjustment process.

Unfortunately this amendment is not contained in the area redevelopment bill reported out by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. As a result there is little constructive legislation before this house designed to alleviate the conditions of depressed areas suffering specifically because of our overall national trade policy.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which I have introduced today is a comprehensive measure to provide governmental assistance to those communities, industries, enterprises, and individuals adversely affected by our reciprocal trade program.

Briefly, this bill would provide help from the Federal Government to retrain individuals for news jobs, to render technical and financial assistance for conversion of plants to new items of production, and to assist communities in their efforts to attract new types of industry.

In the past when imports have reached the so-called peril-point threatening a domestic industry, great pressure has been brought to bear upon the Tariff Commission for restoration of tariffs or imposition of quotas. It is my belief that the executive branch should be provided with another alternative in such situations. It should be able to assist these businesses, industries, and communities as they attempt to adjust to newly created economic conditions.

What I propose in this bill is the establishment of an interdepartmental committee, the Trade Adjustment Board. As an alternative to the acceptance of peril-point and escape-clause recommendations, the President could turn the matter over to this Trade Adjustment Board.

Upon application by a community, an industrial development corporation, a business enterprise, an employee, or a union, the Board could determine whether the applicant had been adversely affected by the lowering of trade barriers. If the Board decided that the applicant had been so injured, many different forms of assistance could be made available.

By shifting the point of adjustment from the tariff itself to the particular community, firm, or individual claiming injury, an equitable trade policy would both encourage the expansion of foreign trade and at the same time minimize the extent of possible injury to the domestic economy.

My bill would provide an orderly and direct means of supplying technical advice and information to seriously afflicted communities.

Another type of aid would be granted in the form of loans. These loans could be made available through the regular procedures of the Small Business Administration.

Firms and communities would also be allowed accelerated amortization in order that they might readily develop new or different lines of production.

Finally, this bill would also provide several types of aid to individual workers who lose their jobs because of our trade policy.

The first assistance granted to these individuals would take the form of additional unemployment compensation. The bill would authorize the supplementing of State benefits from Federal funds. A worker, under this bill, could receive two-thirds of his weekly pay for 52 weeks. This unemployment compensation would, of course, be a stopgap measure, providing benefits only until other employment was available.

If a worker is over 60 years of age when he loses his job through the operation of international trade, and if he cannot get another job because of his age, this bill would allow him to retire under the Social Security Act.

Other workers, however, with many productive years ahead would be provided with an opportunity to receive retraining in skills that are in demand by the national economy.

This trade adjustment program is not a subsidy. It is not permanent assistance enabling industries or communities to hobble along. It is temporary assistance designed to help them over a period of adjustment.

If we believe that world trade is crucial to the future economic health of our Nation, as everyone by now should be convinced it is, then anyone seriously injured in the pursuit of this policy should be eligible to receive aid in order that he might change operations and again become productive.

In the field of veterans' legislation, we refer to a "service-connected disability." That is the way I regard the sacrifices which some of our industries have had to make as we pursue the legitimate objectives of our national trade policy.

It is the responsibility of Congress, I believe, to provide temporary assistance to those trade-affected communities, industries and individuals that need and can use aid as they attempt to diversify or expand their economic base. This bill would not subsidize obsolete plants. It would assist them to make more effective use of their present facilities or aid them in switching to new lines of production.

Mr. Speaker, trade adjustment is not an untried idea. It has been tried and found workable.

I refer to the experience of the European coal and steel community. It was recognized by the farsighted men who set up this first major venture in international administration of economic resources that hardship would fall to certain areas because of greater productivity through technical development and shifts in the centers of production.

So the conception of readaption was evolved and put into operation in 1952. Readaption in the European coal and steel community offers aid to disadvantaged firms and workers similar to those proposed in my trade adjustment bill. This European program by and large has met with success. The recent treaty establishing the European economic community has continued the concept of adjustment assistance in areas affected by the reduction of trade barriers.

This concept of readjustment assistance recognizes that our American economy is able to adapt its productive capacities in order to meet changing conditions. We see this adaptability in action every day as American industry modifies itself so that it may assimilate new products or technological improvements.

Here is a partial but constructive solution for an ancient dilemma which has often plagued Members of Congress. Those who wish to lower tariffs should support trade adjustment for they do not want any domestic interest to be injured. At the same time those who are legitimately concerned about some particular industry or community should find in this trade-adjustment bill a way to assist these individual enterprises while at the same time furthering the overall national interest by increasing world trade.

Everyone should now be aware of our true national interest. The easy argument against foreign imports has prevailed too long. If it results in a further weakening of our trade policy we may all suffer gravely in the future. Totalitarian nations will continue to make inroads into the free world as their trade offensive succeeds beyond their greatest hopes. Our alliances will falter over trade antagonisms. Our domestic economy will decline and American laborers will be out of work as other nations are no longer able to buy our products.

None of these things need happen, of course. A policy of trade adjustment provides the means whereby the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act can be strengthened, not weakened. Under it our trade with the world can continue to increase. Only a vigorous trade program of this sort will keep together a strong free world and promote a continually rising living standard for us all.

Maj. Gen. W. P. Fisher

OF
HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I share with my colleagues a sense of loss at the reassignment of Maj. Gen. W. P. Fisher, Air Force Director of Legislative Liaison. I congratulate him, however, upon his forthcoming assignment, that of commander of the Eastern Air Force of the renowned Military Air Transport Service.

General Fisher is a man of unusual experience and capacity as a commander, beginning with his leadership of the 28th Bomb Squadron, 19th Bomb Group which experienced the Japanese attack on the Philippines in December 1941 and survived.

His great capacity as a leader was notable during his service in the extremely challenging duties which he has had here in Washington. General Fisher is a man respected and admired for his calm, straightforward manner of doing business. His integrity is unquestioned. He has promoted with distinction the cooperative relationship which exists between the Congress and the U.S. Air Force.

I take this opportunity to welcome his successor as Director of Legislative Liaison, Maj. Gen. Thomas C. Musgrave, Jr., who is also an officer of the highest ability.

America's Religious Freedom Omitted From U.S. Exhibit in Moscow

OF
HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to an article which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor on Friday, August 21, 1959, describing the American Exhibition in Moscow.

I think all of you will agree that the Christian Science Monitor is one of the most highly respected newspapers in America, and it is safe to presume that the reports of this newspaper's correspondents are factual and trustworthy.

It is because I have such profound confidence in the integrity of this newspaper that I was particularly disturbed about the following paragraph which was part of the story about the American Exhibit in Moscow in the August 21 issue of the Christian Science Monitor.

The paragraph stated:

> There are also reports that many Soviet visitors have been both perplexed and disappointed that there was not more on religion and religious life in the United States at the exhibition.

It is indeed ironic that the following paragraph in this story is as follows:

> But in certain areas visitors' opinions appear to be highly favorable. One of these is the hi-fi area, which attracts a large number of young people who know a great deal about American music, particularly jazz.

While I have no reason to question the accuracy of the Christian Science Monitor report, in order to assure myself that this report was indeed correct, I sent an inquiry to Mr. Erwin D. Canham, editor of the Christian Science Monitor, who only last week returned from an inspection of the American Exhibit in Moscow. I should like to point out here that Mr. Canham is also president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

In answer to my inquiry, Mr. Canham was kind enough to forward me the following reply:

> Yes, I agree that religious life in America could have been more effectively and explicitly presented. However, there were many pitfalls, including denominational pressures and probably difficulties with the Soviets. It is a subtle problem, since we need to persuade Russians of the real meaning of religion and religious freedom to Americans, not just formal worship as they have known it. It is gratifying that American guides and specialists have often been able to give meaningful and impressive answers to religious questions asked by Soviet visitors.

It is of particular interest to me that in his reply, Mr. Canham does confirm the fact that the Russian people are obviously asking questions about religion in America.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on the basis of these two reports, the Office of the American National Exhibition in Moscow has broken faith with me and the other Members of this Congress.

I should like to recall here that on May 1, 1959, the general manager of the American exhibition, Mr. Harold C. McClellan, assured me in a rather lengthy letter that the "pervasive influence of religion throughout the American society" would be adequately included in the exhibit.

For some time prior to receipt of Mr. McClellan's assurance, I had carried on considerable negotiations with both Mr. McClellan and the U.S. Information Agency to impress on these people that it is my firm belief that the American exhibit should show the Russian people the real dynamics of religious freedom as we know them in this country.

I had pointed out to Mr. McClellan and his associates that the very cornerstone of our freedom in the United States is our deep belief in the Almighty, and I had urged Mr. McClellan to provide perhaps a special exhibit dealing with the subject. Throughout my discussions with Mr. McClellan and his associates, I tried to impress the fact that millions of Russian people who will visit this American exhibit should be made aware that the very basis of our Republic is the spiritual foundation which gives us understanding and compassion in dealing with each other as Americans.

It was on the basis of my firm position on this subject that I received an assurance from Mr. McClellan by letter on May 1 that "we shall do our best to reflect properly the religious side of American life."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on the basis of this article in the Christian Science Monitor, Mr. McClellan has not kept his word, and I strongly urge that that the appropriate committee of this Congress undertake a full investigation to ascertain what factors came into play in omitting this very important aspect of our American life in the exhibit at Moscow.

Ever since the exhibit opened, we have seen press reports of severe censorship of the entire exhibition by Soviet officials. We have seen that our American authorities were not given a free hand in preparing the exhibit so that it would reflect the full meaning of freedom in this country. Only the other day the press carried stories that American officials were compelled to remove a photograph of a hungry child in China holding a bowl of rice.

It was my understanding that some 13 million American dollars have been spent on this exhibit, and I think it is the duty of this Congress to find out what factors were influential when the original agreement for this exhibition was reached with the Soviet authorities. It is my firm conviction that some study should be given to just how much backbone and stamina our American representatives have in dealing with the Soviet Union. There is no question in my mind that if they yield to the Soviet Union on the subject of an exhibit such as the one we are now financing in Moscow, then I hardly think they are capable of dealing with the Soviets on the more profound problems facing the survival of civilization.

I am deeply concerned that those who have set up this exhibit have put their greatest emphasis on the material wealth of America when actually our greatest strength as a nation lies in our spiritual foundation—our freedom of speech, our freedom of the press, our freedom of elections, our freedom of religion, our freedom of assembly.

I need not tell you how chagrined I am that while the organizers of this exhibit could not find sufficient space to tell the Soviet people about our great religious freedom, they did find sufficient resources to emphasize hi-fi and jazz.

Mr. Speaker, I am enclosing the entire text of Mr. McClellan's letter to me of May 1, 1959:

OFFICE OF AMERICAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION IN MOSCOW,
May 1, 1959.

Hon. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PUCINSKI: I acknowledge receipt of your thoughtful letter of April 24 in reference to our conversation concerning the presentation of religion in the American National Exhibition in Moscow this summer.

I have reviewed your letter and its enclosures very carefully and have discussed them with the policy experts on my staff and elsewhere in the executive branch of the Government. It remains my best judgment that we should not present a separate religious exhibit at Moscow, but rather that we should portray the pervasive influence of religion throughout the American society.

I recently returned from Moscow where I have reviewed our plans with Ambassador Thompson, his top officials, and our own exhibit staff. I believe in all sincerity that we are following the proper approach.

I should like to give you an idea of some of the ways we intend to present religion in the exhibit.

1. One of the most striking features of the architectural exhibit will be a set of panels devoted to churches and the creativity of American architecture in the religious tradition.

2. The two motion pictures to be shown at the exhibit will contain photographs of churches and people entering these churches. These two motion pictures are Circarama and the special seven-screen documentary on American life presently under production by Charles Eames.

3. There will be religious literature at the exhibition in the book, magazine, and newspaper section.

4. There will be an exhibit of university catalogs in which courses in religion will appear. There will also be a certain number of catalogs of theological schools.

5. There will be a considerable number of questions in the Ramac electronic calculating machine concerning statistics and information on religion in American life. I cannot yet tell you how many questions because they are still being prepared in the U.S. Information Agency.

6. The exhibit on the American worker in community life will contain photographs and textual material on religious life in the community.

7. There will be some paintings with religious themes in the painting exhibit.

8. The large photographic exhibit, entitled "The Family of Man," has a considerable number of photographs depicting human belief in God.

9. The Gallery of Americans, which is a special exhibit composed of photographs of famous Americans, will include several of the national figures mentioned in your attachment and will include quotations which refer to the subject of religion.

10. Religious music will be included as part of the musical programs presented in both the high-fidelity area and the outside rest area.

Please accept again my appreciation of the time and thought you have given this problem and my assurance that we shall do our best to reflect properly the religious side of American life.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD C. MCCLELLAN,
General Manager.

Luther Burbank Monument

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, I was privileged to participate in the simple, but impressive, exercises marking the dedication of the Luther Burbank monument at Fort Devens.

The exercises took place in that portion of Fort Devens which was once part of the town of Lancaster, where Luther Burbank was born and where he spent the early years of his life. The site of his home was cleared by Army officials at Fort Devens and planted with sugar maples and flowers. A 4-foot obelisk, which was unveiled Saturday, marks the site of the Burbank homestead. The obelisk is inset with a plaque commemorating the site, which will be open to the public for picnicking with the permission of the provost marshal at Fort Devens.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of my address at the dedication ceremonies.

The material follows:

REMARKS OF CONGRESSMAN PHILIP J. PHILBIN AT DEDICATION OF LUTHER BURBANK MEMORIAL, LANCASTER, AUGUST 29, 1959

It is an honor and a happy privilege for me to join you today in paying appropriate tribute to the great Luther Burbank.

Thanks to the wisdom and patriotism of distinguished officials of the town of Lancaster and the incomparably splendid and outstanding leader of our military forces of the Army, General Wooten, we are proud to come here today to this hallowed spot to dedicate this beautiful, lasting memorial to one of history's great geniuses who first saw the light of day here where we gather.

I cannot give too much credit today to Lancaster town officials and leaders, Mr. Burgoyne and the board of selectmen, Rev. John M. O'Brien, Mr. Griswold, Chief Ryder, and to General Wooten and Colonel Rutledge and others interested in this fine project, because without their devoted interest, work, and cooperation, today's commemoration would not have been possible.

It is all the more creditable, desirable, and praiseworthy that we should establish this memorial because in a nation and a world which more and more tends to frown upon tradition and the virtues and glorious achievements of the past as an inspiration and fitting accompaniment to present and future accomplishments, it is all the more appropriate and helpful that we should add this historic shrine raised in honor of the great Burbank to the many of which Lancaster may boast.

My good and distinguished friends, Mrs. Esther B. MacDonald, town clerk of Lancaster, and Mrs. Marion Safford, gifted historian of the town, in their diligence and kindness have on other occasions furnished me with comprehensive biographical information on the life of Luther Burbank which I was happy and proud to use in speeches on the floor of the House of Representatives, first on his 100th birthday and again at the time of the Lancaster tricentennial celebration.

Luther Burbank was born in Lancaster March 7, 1849, the son of Samuel Walton Burbank and Olive Ross Burbank, the 13th child in the family. His father was a prosperous farmer and a maker of brick and pottery.

From his mother, Luther apparently inherited his love of nature, particularly his love of flowers.

He attended the Pine Grove School, a typical New England school in the north part of Lancaster.

When he was 15 years of age he entered Lancaster Academy where he studied for four winters, all the while making good use of the excellent library which, even at such an early date, the progressive and educational-minded people of Lancaster had provided to inculcate and encourage learning in the community.

From his work on the farm Luther early gained a practical knowledge of the life, characteristics and growth of plants.

Sometime after his father's death he purchased a 17-acre farm in Lunenburg where he took up the business of market gardening. It was here that this great genius first produced in quantity his first new plant creation—the Burbank potato.

According to Mrs. Safford he was a quiet, reticent youth who frequently was seen walking along the streets of the town with his hands folded behind his back, apparently in deep thought and in a contemplative mood.

He bred this new species of potato from seed which he found in his garden and sold his crop of seed potatoes to a marketing firm in Boston.

In 1875 when he was about 26 years of age, he sold his farm and went to California where his three older brothers resided, taking with him the capital from the sale of the farm and a small quantity of his newly created potatoes.

His subsequent experiments and creations cover a very wide range and produced revolutionary changes in plant life and methods of cultivation in orchard, garden, field and forest.

Burbank discovered new ways of choosing and caring for seeds, preparing the soil, planting, disease and pest prevention.

He created many new species of berries, fruits, vegetables, and flowers, amazing and unbelievable to botanists and horticulturists.

He improved the size and quality of many species. He utilized grafting to promote startling changes in garden, orchard, and forest.

I could not begin to enumerate his remarkable accomplishments here, but they were epochal, monumental and of lasting value to mankind. Luther Burbank will always be remembered as one of our greatest scientists and one of our greatest Americans.

It is interesting to note that the house where Luther Burbank was born, right here on this very site that we are commemorating today, a large New England style brick home with a wooden ell was razed by the Government when it took over this section of the town to extend Fort Devens during World War II.

Another great American benefactor, Mr. Henry Ford, had purchased the ell of the house some years before and removed it to Dearborn, Mich.

Luther Burbank was born on the second floor in a small room of this ell. Some years ago I talked about Luther Burbank with two of his old schoolmates who long resided in our district, the brothers Fred W. and Luther Bateman, both very prominent and highly respected citizens.

Mr. Fred Bateman who knew Burbank intimately and well, was a famed, successful civil engineer, who even when he was over 90 years of age continued to work daily at his profession. These good men were of the opinion that in his early years Burbank showed great genius and was a painstaking, resourceful experimenter.

The American people, indeed the people of the world have received lasting benefits from the brilliant research and miraculous achievements of Luther Burbank and we are indeed honored today to pay this additional heartfelt tribute to his memory, and express our renewed appreciation for his magnificent work in behalf of science and humanity.

Luther Burbank was the product of this proud, rugged, Lancaster environment, of hardworking people and he unquestionably derived much of his skill and genius from the frugal, industrious habits, willingness to perform hard work and tenacious purpose from his rugged New England forbears and from the favorable, encouraging climate of this distinguished and progressive town of Lancaster.

It was here that he had his humble beginning, got his early training and drew deep inspiration.

It was here that the hand of destiny first placed upon his brow the diadem of genius and greatness.

It was here amidst the eternal, green hills, fertile valleys, and beautiful countryside of old New England where American liberty was nurtured and where its spirit still animates the hearts and minds of the people, that Luther Burbank's brilliant work found its source and its stimulus.

It is for us and succeeding generations to keep in mind and to perpetuate the great spiritual values which are represented in and responsible for the illustrious career of Burbank and his service to humanity—his profound belief in the Almighty, his reverence for free institutions and his faith in himself which led him to lasting fame and, more than that, enabled him to contribute so mightily to the welfare and happiness of people of every race, color and creed the world over.

Among Burbank's most beautiful creations was the Shasta daisy which the people and the schoolchildren of Lancaster and of his adopted home in California believe should become the national flower of our country.

It is fitting on this occasion that we should make reference to this beautiful flower because of all his creations it perhaps best exemplifies the hardy, inconquerable spirit of the great Luther Burbank. May we of this troubled time draw courage and inspiration from the homely virtues and patriotism of Luther Burbank. May his fine example and brilliant achievements long continue to inspire and guide us in the perpetuation of freedom, justice, and peace.

This is probably the last occasion upon which our distinguished friend, General Wooten, will be officially with us. He has been promoted to a much higher post of responsibility in our great Army and, in time, because of his great talents, ability and high purpose he will undoubtedly go right to the very top of his proud calling.

We are all greatly indebted to this great American soldier, not only for his peerless service at Fort Devens, but also for his warm friendship, the interest he has taken in our community affairs, the effective cooperation which he has always given us.

Though we all rejoice in his promotion, we are very sorry to have him leave this district where he has made so many friends and where he is so highly esteemed and beloved. We hope he will return often to see us.

In behalf of our district, our people and myself I wish to express to him today our sincere and deep gratitude for his many contributions, congratulations upon his advancement and very best wishes to him and his family for many more happy, constructive years in the service of our great Nation.

May the memory and achievements of Luther Burbank long continue to inspire our people and to nurture and develop more great men from our midst to serve wholeheartedly and unselfishly in the tasks and the cause of peace.

Father DAVID TEMPLE,
Franciscan Province of Santa Barbara.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ladies and gentlemen, at this time I would like to introduce our first speaker, the Honorable JOHN SHELLEY, Congressman from San Francisco.

Congressman SHELLEY. Mr. Chairman, Your Excellency Most Reverend Bishop Hannan, Right Reverend and Very Reverend Monsignori, Reverend Fathers, representatives of the Governments of Spain and Mexico, my colleagues in the Congress of the United States and ladies and gentleman. It is first my privilege to read a couple of messages that were addressed to my office which arrived this morning:

AUGUST 26, 1959.

Hon. JOHN F. SHELLEY,
Old House Building,
Washington, D.C.:

It is a privilege to join with the Serra Society on the occasion of the observance of the 175th anniversary of the passing of Father Junipero Serra. The people of San Francisco are continually aware of the tremendous contribution made to this area by Father Serra. Were it not for his saintly efforts, San Francisco and California would be lacking in many of our greatest spiritual assets. However, our indebtedness to Father Serra exceeds even the sphere of the church as evidenced by the many temporal accomplishments justly accredited to his untiring efforts. San Francisco's debt to Father Serra and his coworkers of nearly two centuries ago can never be fully repaid.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER,
Mayor, San Francisco, Calif.

AUGUST 26, 1959.

The Honorable JOHN SHELLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington D.C.:

It is distinct pleasure to extend my warmest felicitations to the California legislators and the Serra Club of Fort Belvoir as you gather to commemorate the 175th anniversary of the death of Father Junipero Serra. In keeping his cherished memory alive you do a great service to the church and to the country. May the high ideals of this zealous apostle continue to inspire you and may God abundantly bless your devoted work.

Archbishop VAGNOZZI,
Apostolic Delegate to the United States.

AUGUST 27, 1959.

Hon. JOHN F. SHELLEY,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Understand you will be present at ceremonies before statue of Junipero Serra. Would appreciate your acting as my representative and reading the following message:

It is fitting that in this year marking the 175th anniversary of Serra's death there be a program in his honor in the Statuary Hall of the Nation's Capitol. Father Junipero Serra is truly the first of the pioneers who inaugurated the history of civilized California. He personally established 9 of the 21 missions and made a host of other great contributions to the future of this State. The people of California owe him great and lasting honor and we appreciate the effort made by those of you present today.

Sincerely,

EDMUND G. BROWN,

AUGUST 28, 1959.

Hon. JOHN SHELLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

The Native Daughters of the Golden West extend congratulations to Fort Belvoir Serra Club for this observance honoring Junipero Serra whom we revere and honor as the founder of our missions and father of California. Our order recognizes the great contribution Father Serra made to our State and we are happy to participate in this commemoration. I am proud to announce that we are beginning a project for the placement of a statue of Father Serra on the capitol grounds at Sacramento. The Native Sons of the Golden West will cosponsor this project with us. We will be happy to have assistance from other organizations or friends. I wish it were possible to be present for your program, but as it is not, I am delighted to have my daughter represent me and the Native Daughters of the Golden West.

MAXINE PORTER,
Grand President, NDGW.

A MESSAGE FROM JOHN B. SCHMOLLE, GRAND PRESIDENT, NATIVE SONS OF THE GOLDEN WEST, TO THE CALIFORNIA DELEGATION HONORING THE 175TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF FATHER JUNIPERO SERRA AT STATUE OF FATHER SERRA IN STATUARY HALL, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Father Junipero Serra—apostle of California—left an impact on the culture of the State which will live eternal. The simple kindliness which emanated from this man of God still permeates the atmosphere of California. His development and plan of the chain of missions was done in a time and an era devoid of the materials and mechanical knowledge ordinarily attendant and available to structures even at that period.

Using the elements of nature and the products of the earth, coupled with the resourcefulness of a master builder, this man of God and his aids, drew on their storehouse of knowledge to erect in the primitive wilderness of California the buildings recognized by the civilized world as suitable habitations for the purpose they were to serve. All of the buildings still stand in one form or another—some in semirepair—some still in use. All are shrines, not only to the lover of history and the romantic period known as the Splendid Idle Forties, but also to the devout. Over 1 million tourists annually visit the missions of California.

The results of these buildings have been reflected over the entire history of California. In the architectural field the copyists refer to the buildings as mission style and replicas are still being built today, both for commercial and residential use, by people who have been enamored of this gracious form of building.

This diminutive man in body had the heart, mind, and spirit of a giant and symbolically represents the heart of California. As grand president of the Native Sons of the Golden West, it is my great privilege to write these few words honoring him, for he was a beacon and established a light that has never failed; the forerunner and possibly the reason for the greatest mass migration the world has ever known.

JOHN B. SCHMOLLE,
Grand President, Native Sons of the Golden West.

AUGUST 28, 1959.

Congressman JOHN F. SHELLEY,
Capitol, Washington, D.C.:

San Francisco Serra Club joins with you on the commemorative 175th anniversary of the death of our beloved patron Father Junipero Serra.

ALBERT E. MAGGIO,
President.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN SHELLEY

Ladies and gentlemen, there is a television series called "I Led Three Lives." This same title is particularly applicable to the State's founder, Padre Junipero Serra, and is especially significant this year. The year 1959 marks the 175th anniversary of Father Serra's death, the 190th anniversary of his arrival in upper California, and the 210th anniversary of his departure from his homeland in Spain. The first 36 years of his life Padre Junipero Serra spent on his native island of Mallorca. There he entered the Franciscan Order in 1730. After obtaining the doctorate in sacred theology, he devoted some 10 years to a distinguished career of teaching, even occupying a chair in the Lullian University of St. Raymond. His ability as a professor was rivaled only by his popularity as a preacher. In 1749 Father Serra sailed to the New World to become a missionary. His first assignment was in the mountains, Sierra Gorda, where in some 9 years he could report that not a single unconverted Indian remained in the region. Eight more years he passed crisscrossing central Mexico preaching missions to the faithful. In 1768 he was appointed padre presidente of the chain of missions in lower California. The following year brought the fulfillment of his heart's desire when he was designated the pioneer priest to handle the Christianizing of upper California. Father Serra helped blaze the trail that is still known as El Camino Real and founded the first 9 of the missions that eventually became a chain of 21. In 1784 he concluded his threefold career which had been lived in three countries and in three realms of activity. Today the servant of God is known and revered throughout the world for his zeal and for his holiness, and tomorrow we hope that the church in her wisdom and her prudence will reward this reputation with her highest honor—the canonization of Father Serra as a saint.

It is now my privilege to present my colleague from California, the senior Senator from California, the Honorable THOMAS KUCHEL.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR KUCHEL

Representative SHELLEY. Your Excellency, reverend clergy, members of the diplomatic corps, my colleagues in the Congress, ladies and gentleman, these services commemorate the life and labors of a Franciscan friar whose intrepid Christian ministrations were spread through a great primitive area before the United States came into being. Junipero Serra, Franciscan missionary from Mallorca, journeyed to the North American Continent in the 1750's, came to the city of Mexico and in the late 1760's went northward to upper California. In that northward trek, both he and his courageous, faithful and devoted companions, sowed in the hearts and in the minds of men, the seeds of a new civilization under the Divine Spirit. Father Serra brought with him the mission which meant the spread of religion in these unknown lands, the presidio which meant the expansion of the political and military control of Spain, and the pueblo (a town) which meant the establishment of orderly civil government. Here was a tripartite development both secular and spiritual. The hard trails which his weary feet traversed, from mission to mission, along the El Camino Real today continues to be the wayroad along which our strong great municipalities, great universities, great industry, great agriculture, and the great missions of his day—human progress in its every latest attainment. One hundred and seventy-five years ago, Father Serra departed this life. From a primitive unsettled land on the Pacific shore to which he came, has developed now a majestic center of cultural and economic life rich in all the bounty of God's nature, our magnificent State of California. While we honor Junipero Serra for the blessings of civilization which he left in California, we shall not forget that his was a spiritual labor. The missions he built, the agriculture he founded supported by irrigation systems which, incidentally, still excite the admiration of modern hydraulic engineers, were all means to an end. The sword was there to support the cross, and so was the civil authority—but it was the cross which came first. Imbued with Divine Spirit, charged with an exalted mission and sustained by an unfaltering faith—Father Serra brought to the Indians the civilizing message of Christian teachings. Here was the solid, sound foundation upon which all other building rested. It is well to recall this simple fact in our day, for we too have an exalted mission—to hold high the banner of man's freedom to protect it from all assaults from the ungodly and to advance it with God's grace by an unfaltering faith in the righteousness of our purposes.

Congressman SHELLEY. Senator ENGLE, the junior Senator from California, was to have been here but was detained by a debate on the floor—that's his job—he has to be there. He has very graciously sent a very charming young lady from his office who will deliver the message of Senator ENGLE, of California.

SENATOR ENGLE'S ADDRESS

Your Excellency, reverend monsignori, reverend fathers, Mr. SHELLEY, Senator KUCHEL, Members of Congress, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I bring the greetings and regrets of Senator ENGLE, who is now engaged in a major speech on the Senate floor which he was obliged to make at this hour, and he was especially sorry to miss this beautiful ceremony this morning. In his name, I would like to read a few remarks in tribute to Father Serra.

The highest honor any State can confer on a native son is to place his statue here in Statuary Hall in the Nation's Capitol. Each State has been most careful in the selection of the individuals it has placed here. If you visit the respective States, you will find the statue of their favorite son in numerous places there. The statue of Padre Junipero Serra, accordingly, is found throughout California, in public plazas and in private patios, before courthouses and in lush parks. Streets are named in his honor and buildings are dedicated in his memory. Schools, theaters, and a retreat house bear the name of Serra. Such honor you would more or less expect to find in the Golden State but you find a statue of the venerated Franciscan in the vestibule of St. Peter's Church in Chicago's Loop. You see his image on the facade of Holy Name College here in Washington as well as in mosaic at the new Shrine of the Immaculate Conception. You cannot miss his identity in the ceramic of the new church of St. Francis Xavier in Phoenix, Ariz., and he holds aloft the cross from the roof of Casa de Paz Ybien in the same Valley of the Sun. His statue stands on the tables as he presides at every meeting of Serra clubs throughout these United States, and as Serra International grows, his statue moves into foreign lands. If you travel to Mexico you will find him in the vestibule of the church of San Fernando College, the cradle from which California was born. His name and reputation are held in veneration throughout the land to our south. In Mallorca you will find his statue in the principal plaza of his native town. Throughout Spain his name is revered. And now in the eternal city of Rome itself, the new American Franciscan college currently under construction is to be known as Collegeo Franchiscano de Americano de Junipero Serra. Here is a true American success story. The annals of our history feature those who have risen from poverty to riches, from obscurity to influential positions in public life. Not a few immigrants to this country have landed on our shore penniless, uneducated, and uncultured. Lifting themselves by their own bootstraps in this land of equal opportunity to all, they have attained prominence and importance to truly amaze historian and biographer alike. Padre Junipero Serra born in the small village of Petra Mallorca, in the poorest section of that little town, his humble origin might have suggested that he follow in the family simple tradition of farming. His illiterate background portended no brilliant future, yet under Franciscan tutelage first at San Bernardino in Petra, and later at San Francisco in Palma, he manifested such superior native talent and such proficiency in scientific work that he was awarded the doctorate in sacred theology and held the chair of theology in the renowned Lullian University of St. Raymond. All that he sacrificed when he sailed for the New World. While I would not here repeat the story of his life, I would underline his sharing of the American tradition. Although of poor and humble background, he rose to international preeminence. Today three countries claim him either as native son or adopted father. We Californians are justifiably proud to join with our Mallorcan friends in acclaiming him El Foundador de California—the founder of California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ladies and gentlemen, it is my honor now to present Father Noel F. Moholoy, O.F.M., S.T.D., vice postulator for the cause of Padre Serra, from Santa Barbara, Calif.

ADDRESS BY REVEREND MOHOLOY, O.F.M., S.T.D.

Your Excellency Bishop Hannon, right reverend Monsignori, reverend fathers, Members of Congress, honored guests of the diplomatic corps, ladies and gentlemen, unable to stand or even to sit, the father now 55 years old lay restless on his bed of pain. Word spread throughout the camp quickly that Father Junipero Serra was ill. Don Gasparde Portala, the military commander of the expedition, immediately went to the friar's tent, appraised the situation realistically, and told the little padre that he would make arrangements immeditaely to have him transferred to San Fernando de Bellacepa, the mission Serra had founded 4 days previously. The pain disappeared instantaneously as the little Mallorcan reacted aghast: "No. If I die on the road, I'm still going to go." And he called the muleteer and asked him to apply the same tallow and herbs that he used on the pack animals. The next morning Junipero Serra celebrated mass and continued on to San Diego in the land of heart's desire. Frequently in the years that followed Serra was to manifest the same type of determination. When the entire colony in the spring of 1770 was preparing to leave, to abandon California, he was on Presidio Hill, in characteristic prayer begging that the relief ship San Antonio would arrive on time. But already a month previously he had served his ultimatum—"Though they all go back, I will remain here with Father Fray Juan (Crespi) to the bitter end." In answer to his prayer, the ship arrived, and he was revealing the watchword he had manifested in the farewell letter to his parents years before: "Always to go forward and never to turn back." He was an enthusiast and a zealot. To him the magnificent bay named in honor of St. Francis was a watery barrier hindering his progress for he envisioned missions as far north as Alaska in his own lifetime and commissioned expeditions to go there. For 15 years he labored in the area in the modern State of California working zealously planting nine of the crosses along El Camino Real, where weary Spaniard and wary Indian alike would find hospitality, nourishment for the body and heavenly food for the soul. And it was only when the Angel of Death hovered over his simple pallet that to his beloved son Carlos de Bormelo de Carmello he finally said: "I must take some rest." The West has always boasted that it is a land where men are men. Father Serra can well be said to have set the precedent. He rolled up his sleeves and went to work. California has accorded him her highest honor by placing his statue here in Statuary Hall of the Nation's Capitol. The Franciscan Fathers of California have been laboring for 18 years and longer to place around that head the halo of a saint.

Congressman SHELLEY. It is my privilege at this time, ladies and gentlemen, to present for remarks the Honorable EUGENE J. MCCARTHY, U.S. Senator from Minnesota, Senator MCCARTHY.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR M'CARTHY

Mr. SHELLEY, Your Excellency, Right Reverend and Very Reverend Monsignori, Reverend Fathers, representatives of the diplomatic corps, of the administration, my colleagues of the Senate, Senator KUCHEL and Members of the House, ladies and gentlemen, friends of the cause of Father Junipero Serra. It is truly a privilege for me, from Minnesota, and the U.S. Senate outside of the Californians to be here to participate in this program. I think that you of California and of the Serra Club and the Franciscans who have had Father Serra to themselves for so many years, must now come to accept that throughout this country and throughout the world, his great work has been known and his cause has many supporters as he has many followers. It may be significant that now that California is no longer the western frontier of the United States, that it is now in effect the geographical center of the country, that Father Serra will be accepted too, as standing in the center of this United States, and the things for which he stood become more widely known and more widely accepted. It is significant I think that he labored in California in the same years during which men of politics labored on this eastern coast to establish the institutions and the traditions which have been the strength of democratic society here in the United States. His approach, as has been said by others here before me, was somewhat different. His emphasis was on the cross and on the things of the spirit but his labors were not restricted to that field, because he knew, as well or better than any man, along with the things of the spirit, it was needed to have political order and economic and social order. So, dedicated to the cross and things of the spirit, he built these other institutions as men of politics establishing this United States sought to build political institutions and economic and social institutions which would establish the means and conditions out of which spiritual perfection might be achieved. So let me congratulate you, the friends of Father Serra, Californians, members of the Serra Club, and particularly the Franciscan Order and to express my hope that his particular cause, the cause of his canonization, may prosper, but along with that, and more important, the cause which he so well advanced in his own time will prosper even more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We of Serra and California, thank you Mr. MCCARTHY for your remarks. Mr. Hubert Kelly, chairman of the special events committee, Serra Club of Fort Belvoir, will present the wreath laying ceremonies.

Mr. HUBERT KELLY. Thank you Dr. Doran. I shall first call upon Father Clebus Wheeler, Minister-Provincial of the Franciscan Order of Friars Minor to bless the floral offerings that we are about to present. Father Wheeler.

BLESSING

We ask of our Heavenly Father that He speed the cause of Father Serra, that He bless these wreaths we are about to put on the foot of his statue and that He bless us in the name of the Father, of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Mr. HUBERT KELLY. The first wreath will be presented for Serra International by Mr. Peter A. Mills, Knight of St. Gregory, Pittsburgh, Pa., the permanent chairman of the Father Serra Spiritual Observance Day, and past trustee of Serra International, and by Mr. Ralph Hauenstein of Grand Rapids, Mich., first vice president of Serra International.

Mr. Mills and Mr. Hauenstein thereupon placed a wreath at the foot of the Serra statue.

The second wreath will be presented for the Serra Club of Fort Belvoir by Mr. Joseph S. Hoffmann, Alexandria, Va., past president of the Serra Club of Fort Belvoir, and deputy district governor of district 19 of the Serra International, and Mr. Fiori J. Tamanini, also a past president of Serra Club at Fort Belvoir.

The second wreath was placed before the Serra statue by Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Tamanini.

We will now call upon Father (Lieutenant Colonel) Pawlowicz, post chaplain of Fort Belvoir and acting chaplain of the Serra Club of Fort Belvoir to make one final introduction before closing the ceremony with the Serran prayer. Father Pawlowicz.

Father PAWLOWICZ. I would like at this time to ask all the distinguished guests to remain seated until after the ceremony is over and also to call upon His Excellency, the Most Reverend Philip M. Hannan, auxiliary bishop of Washington, D.C., to present benediction after the prayer of the Serrans.

PRAYER FOR VOCATIONS

O God who wills not the death of a sinner, but rather that he be converted and live, grant, we beseech Thee, through the intercession of the Blessed Mary, ever virgin, and all the saints, an increase of laborers for Thy church, fellow laborers with Christ, to spend and consume themselves for souls, through the same Jesus Christ, Thy Son, who liveth and reigneth with Thee, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, world without end. Amen.

Bishop HANNAN. I think it is fitting on an occasion like this to recite the prayer of St. Francis, a prayer which certainly epitomizes the life of Father Serra. In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

PRAYER

Lord make me an instrument of Thy peace; where there is hatred, let me sow love; where there is injury, pardon; where there is doubt, faith; where there is despair, hope; where there is darkness, light; and where there is sadness, joy.

O Divine Master, grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled as to console; to be understood, as to understand; to be loved, as to love; for it is in giving that we receive, it is in pardoning that we are pardoned, and it is in dying that we are born to eternal life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the distinguished and honored guests please remain for the press and the photographers. The ceremony is ended.

Alaska's Air Transport

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator E. L. (BOB) BARTLETT, of Alaska, recently participated in a most important meeting of short-haul airline operators in a twin city Alaskan appearance in Anchorage and Fairbanks, July 28 to July 31.

This meeting of the Association of Local Transport Airlines featured an address delivered by our distinguished committee member, Senator BARTLETT, on Wednesday, July 29, 1959, in Anchorage, Alaska, saluting civil aviation in Alaska, past and present, and should be of the greatest interest to all the distinguished Members of this body.

Recognizing the active and most constructive aviation role my distinguished colleague has played in this, his first session as a member of the Subcommittee on Aviation, Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I ask unanimous consent to have Senator BARTLETT'S address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR E. L. (BOB) BARTLETT, OF ALASKA, TO THE ASSOCIATION OF LOCAL TRANSPORT AIRLINES AT ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, JULY 29, 1959

I am exceedingly pleased to be here addressing you this evening, and want to thank you for honoring me with the invitation to take part in your winged visit to Alaska and to speak to you.

My friends from the Anchorage Chamber of Commerce will join me, I'm sure, in expressing our State's warmest welcome to you of the Association of Local Transport Airlines.

I was all the more ready to accept this invitation to be with you of the association because it was extended to me by Col. Joseph P. Adams, general counsel and executive director of this splendid aviation group. I count it a privilege to name Joe Adams as a friend. Joe has a way of getting around on Capitol Hill and in the executive departments of Government which is just as effective as it is proper. Come to think of it, I wonder if all these local airlines would be in existence if it were not for Joe Adams. As a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, who served the public interests faithfully and well, Joe insisted that the little fellow get a break. He prevailed. There were many times, I know, when it would have been easier for him to give up, and jettison his cargo, to lower his landing gear and set down in the face of the very formidable opposition which confronted him. But Joe is not that kind of a man. He persevered, and won out. The public won at the same time.

We Alaskans feel we have an important stake in your association. After all, 5 of the local service airlines that are lifelines in our farflung State form a rather substantial part of your membership of 16 companies. We remember, too, that you had the courtesy, when you first organized in 1957, to reflect Alaska in your original name—the Association of Local and Territorial Airlines. And I can well imagine that you were almost as pleased as we when the march of American history caused you to change that name by dropping the territorial reference.

For many long years "statehood" was a word that had a bitter flavor for us. Now it tastes deliciously sweet as it rolls off our tongues. I understand that statehood has been sweetening the balance sheets of the local service airlines in Alaska and Hawaii, too, by booming the business and tourist traffic. For the benefit of any Civil Aeronautics Board auditors who may be within earshot, let it be stated that this comes to me strictly as rumor. I haven't examined a single account sheet. And I hope this effect extends to your members in what we've taken to calling "the other 48 States" by picking up the pace of their traffic.

It is my fond belief that we have had only the first taste of the benefits of Alaska and Hawaii statehood, and that your palates and ours will be more and more delighted as we grow in the coming years.

Now, having welcomed you on Alaska's behalf, I want to do a turnabout and join those of you from outside in saluting our hosts—Alaska Airlines, Northern Consolidated Airlines, Reeve Aleutian Airways, and Wien Alaska Airlines.

The labors of our intrepid bush pilots gave birth to these airlines. And their history, for high drama, is unexcelled anywhere.

Some of you may recall that one of these airline founders, Bob Reeve, was my rival in a delegate election a few years ago. If things had turned out a bit differently, your speaker tonight might well be one far better qualified on the subject of Alaska aviation.

But I can speak with a good deal of experience as a passenger. Having been a patron of your four host companies during the travels involved in eight campaigns plus a lifetime of residence in Alaska, I can truly say that I know them well, and I hold them in the highest respect.

Even so, a speaker is bound to gulp a few times when he gets upon his feet to talk about aviation to a group of aviation experts. But a politician is never noted for his lack of temerity and so I prepare to take the plunge. Not earthward, however. We are on a higher level tonight. Even as a layman, I can and will make a brag. In about 35 years of flying, most of it within Alaska and starting in the very early days of aviation, I have never had a forced landing. And I attribute this remarkable record less to my own luck than to the splendid skill of the Alaska aviators who have manned the Alaska skies from then until now.

Happily, one does not have to be a flyer himself to make reference to Alaska's airmindedness, air traffic, airports, aircraft and aviators.

Will anyone rise to challenge the statement that Alaskans are the most airminded people in the world? I don't think so—at least not successfully.

Tonight we are dealing almost solely with facts, and very little if at all with fiction. You have no choice in the matter. I am on my feet in firm, if temporary, control and you may escape a barrage of facts only by departing the room. First, I hand to you one which defies analysis, which is simply incredible, which nonetheless has its veracity attested to by the Civil Aeronautics Board. It is that certified Alaska air carriers last year carried 409 passengers per thousand population. This was more than 22 times the U.S. average of 18 passengers per thousand. Let this be a goal for the 11 non-Alaska members of the Association of Local Transport Airlines.

Alaska is the smallest State in population, making up only twelve one-hundredths of 1 percent of the U.S. total. But in proportion to this population, her air commerce traffic pattern is fantastic.

In 1958, Alaska aircraft departures totaled almost 88,000, equal to 2.8 percent of the U.S. domestic total—or 23 times what the population proportion would lead you to expect. The number of passengers boarded was about 320,600, equal to seventy-four one-hundredths of 1 percent of the domestic total—or six times what you would expect. Tons of cargo totaled more than 10,000, equal to 2.3 percent of the domestic total—or 19 times what you would expect. Tons of airmail was the greatest of all: 7,192 tons, equal to 4.8 percent of the domestic total—or 40 times the population proportion. When we say "send it airmail," as so many of our firms do on their business letterheads, we really mean it.

Of course there are sound reasons for our airmindedness. We are short of highway and railroad mileage. The operation of ocean and river vessels is seasonal in many areas, while on the other hand our flying weather in many regions is best in winter. In vast parts of Alaska the local service airline or the bush aircraft is the only practical means of transportation. Then, too, our people have always been eager to be linked as closely as possible with the rest of the United States, which helps explain why we're the flyingest, airmailingest people anywhere.

How about airports? The State division of airports estimates that Alaska has about 600 landing areas of all categories. Gene Roguszka, director of aviation, recently sent me a very handy Alaska airport directory. It lists more than 300 airstrips and seaplane landing areas, and provides maps of most of them.

The 1959 national airport plan issued by the Federal Aviation Agency includes 270 Alaska air commerce airports—4 of them intercontinental, 9 continental, 68 trunk, 111 local, and 78 seaplane facilities. Also included in the plan are 64 general aviation airports.

Aircraft? Alaska's owned total of active registered aircraft was 1,179 as of last January 1. In this measurement we were not, as you might expect, close to such sparsely settled Western States as New Mexico, Wyoming, and the like—but rather to more populous States like Oregon and Louisiana. To put it another way, Alaska has 1 aircraft for every 180 residents, which is unquestionably the highest ratio in the United States.

Of these 1,179 aircraft, 56 were, under the new FAA classification, listed as scheduled and irregular air carriers. However, some of our carriers are in the next 2 categories—among the 64 multiengine planes and 420 postwar 4- and 5-place single engine planes listed under "general aviation." Finally, in the "all other" category, we have 639 more aircraft.

At the same time, we had 2,877 active pilots, or about 1 Alaskan out of every 75. A number of others who once were licensed no longer are on the active list. There has been a lot of talk lately about retiring pilots at the age of 60, or thereabouts. This reminds me that I am now engaged in a research operation aimed at discovering whether A. A. Bennett is still in the land of the living. If he is, you may be sure that he is still flying at an age not exactly known to me but surely such that he would consider a pilot of 60 a mere youngster. From Fairbanks, where he was one of the organizers of the Bennett-Rodebaugh Airplane Co., A. A. Bennett went down to Idaho. He had his commercial license renewed there in 1957 but as yet my research organization has not advanced beyond that point. Bennett was one of the fabulous characters of early-day Alaska aviation. He steadfastly refused to go in for such a modern contrivance as a cabin airplane. Forced finally to give in by the stress of economic competition, Bennett persuaded the Zenith people to build him a special plane with a cabin for the passengers up forward and open cockpit for the flyer way back aft. Bennett was not adverse to telling anyone, most particularly his passengers, the reason for this. He admitted that airplanes fell down once in a while out of the sky and hit the hard, hard earth and he did not propose to be right on top of the engine when and if this occurred. Let the passengers bear the brunt of this while he took charge from the rear, Bennett said.

And he had the clearest blue eyes ever possessed by man. It was this oldtimer's persistent insistence that his eyesight was perfect because when flying he took off his goggles and stuck his head out of the cockpit. He said the gale into which he then faced toned up his optic muscles, and did everything except erase original sin. But I must guard myself for it is easy to start reminiscing about an extraordinary breed of men—the early-day Alaska pilots.

A significant illustration occurred right here in Anchorage last week, revealing that today's men of wings are in tune in every way with those who started Alaska's aviation. This came about when Don Sheldon of Talkeetna was presented with the Special Service Award by General Necresop. This is the highest award given a civilian by the Air Force.

No doubt you have heard Anchorage referred to as the air crossroads of the world. Lest you think our chamber of commerce friends are overstating their case, let me note that in calendar 1958 the FAA towers at International Airport, Merrill Field, and Lake Hood controlled a total of 406,701 aircraft movements. This was only a few thousand less than at the busiest single airport in the Nation—Midway at Chicago.

Our international airports at Anchorage and Fairbanks are in superb locations astride the aerial routes from the Eastern United States to the Far East, and from the Western United States to Europe, over the pole. I think the day is approaching when—if with God's help the peace is kept—other Asia air centers, in China and the Soviet Union, will be reached by flights from Alaska. But even if Peiping, Moscow, and Irkutsk do not go up on our destination boards, we can nevertheless look ahead to great growth in our international traffic.

While our intercontinental air traffic is significant today and has great future potential, intra-Alaska traffic is even more striking in relation to national figures. FAA records show that some 66,500 landings were made last year at the 28 intermediate airfields in Alaska. That figure is higher than the total of landings made at the 74 intermediate fields elsewhere in the United States. Air carriers accounted for more than one-third of these landings, which testifies to the vigor of our local service airlines.

These airlines offer plane-window vistas of scenery as awe inspiring as any on the face of the globe. They offer, too, unique recreational tours—to the Arctic, to the Pribilof Islands in the fur seal mating season, to Katmai National Monument for unmatched trout fishing, and to the national park at America's highest peak, Mount McKinley.

Congress and the Federal Government have for years recognized the importance of aviation to Alaska. But our Territorial status and our lack of voting representation have tended to hold back full development of our airports and related facilities.

In 1948 Congress authorized Federal construction and operation of completely new international airports at Anchorage and Fairbanks. The initial appropriation of $13 million was raised to $17 million 2 years later.

Anchorage International Airport received the lion's share of the money and was somewhat more adequately planned and built than Fairbanks International. Today both these airports urgently need runway extensions to meet the demands of the jet age.

The coming of statehood altered our airport situation and presented problems to which the Alaska delegation in Congress and the State government have devoted major attention.

In recommending provisions for the Alaska omnibus bill this year, the Eisenhower administration proposed to get Uncle Sam out of the international airport business in Alaska by giving the Anchorage and Fairbanks Airports to the State without charge.

The omnibus bill—now enacted into law—also provided transitional grants of $28½ million during the 5 fiscal years, beginning with the current one. Of these transitional grants, it was understood $4½ million should be applied to capital improvements at the international airports.

However, the extensions at Anchorage and Fairbanks were estimated at a cost of some $9,800,000. So it became obvious that Alaska would have to get more than the flat sum of $1,350,000 a year it received in recent years under the Federal airports program if the improvements were to be made.

Under the old Airport Act, Alaska was of course treated as a Territory. It did not share funds on the basis of a land area and population formula, as the other States did. Nor was Alaska eligible to receive any of the $15-million-a-year discretionary fund which could be allocated by the program administrator to the most important projects, wherever they might be. But the Territory did have one advantage in the old law. It was required to match funds on a 3-Federal dollars-to-1-Territorial-dollar basis, instead of the split of about 2 Federal dollars to 1 State dollar for public lands States.

Early in this session, the Senate passed a new airport bill. It would have boosted the available funds considerably, but would have continued to treat Alaska—and Hawaii—on a basis similar to that in the old law as far as matching and eligibility were concerned.

The House of Representatives, however, took a quite different approach to the airport bill. The House cut back the proposed expenditures in relation to the Senate version, but on the other hand it proposed to treat Alaska on the same basis as other States.

The House, while it was more modest than the Senate, still favored a higher level program than the old one. But the administration wanted to phase out the entire airport program gradually. So the battle of the budget soon was raging around the airport issue.

Senate and House conferees could not agree on either one of the bills passed, nor on a compromise somewhere in between. As their discussions wore on, tempers grew more and more brittle. The upshot was that, under the pressure of a June 30 deadline, the conferees finally recommended a simple 2-year extension of the old $63-million-dollar-a-year program. Both Houses reluctantly accepted this recommendation.

This meant Alaska would get only $1,350,000 and still would be treated as a Territory. When this decision was reached in conference it was simply impossible thereafter to make any changes referring to Alaska especially, or to make any changes at all in any part of the program.

The inadequate treatment of Alaska was so flagrant that the President called for its correction when he signed the Airport Act extension.

Next, the Alaska delegation introduced an amending bill. It would have boosted our State's share of the airport funds by adding money to be distributed under the overall formula and by making Alaska eligible to share on the same basis as other States. However, as more pencils were brought into use to do the necessary calculations, it became apparent that around $11 million in additional funds would have to be authorized by amendatory legislation if Alaska were to receive that which it would be entitled to as a State without any of the other States suffering cutbacks, which they were not at all willing to accept. We were told very frankly that an effort to add any such sum would, if successful, confront a Presidential veto.

Obviously, there was no point then in engaging in legislative exercises in the Congress for the fun of it. And, very factually, I must add that I think that neither the House nor the Senate would have accepted a bill adding to the total airport sum by about $11 million. When the conferees decided, and the two Houses accepted the proposal for a simple extension of the existing act there was no likelihood that any substantial amendment would thereafter be accepted.

What to do, then? The members of the Alaska congressional delegation considered this as a proposition of the greatest urgency and importance. We held meetings with the Deputy Director of the Bureau of the Budget and a group of his people. It was then that the hopelessness of expecting a worthwhile amendment to the Airport Act became apparent. If I may give myself a measure of credit it was about that time that I came to the conclusion that the most we could hope for—and the very vital most it could turn out to be—would be to amend the law so as to permit Alaska to share in the discretionary funds allotted to the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency. Following the meeting with the Bureau of the Budget the members of the Alaska congressional delegation had another meeting with Deputy FAA Administrator James T. Pyle, and members of his staff. Whether it was by coincidence or whether in the circumstances it was the only decision that could be made, they and I about simultaneously at this meeting put the stamp of endorsement on a sharing in the discretionary fund.

The Administrator's views were not long after communicated to the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee when Jim Pyle said in part:

"If the amendment which I recommended is adopted, Alaska will receive money to meet its urgent needs out of the discretionary fund. The Administrator will be in a position to insure that such money is used to meet these needs, and he will also require that Alaska be treated like other States in matching the Federal funds advanced. Alaska will also retain the advantage of having its share of project costs financed out of the $1,350,000 already authorized remain at 25 percent."

Mr. Pyle's statement about matching any discretionary funds granted means Alaska must put up 37½ percent to Uncle Sam's 67½ percent. But on the basic allocation Alaska will continue to match one-quarter to the Federal Government's three-quarters.

The amendment recommended by the FAA was accepted by the Senate committee which unanimously reported the bill. The bill was then passed by the Senate last week. I have talked with Chairman HARRIS of the corresponding House committee and urged prompt action on the bill there. I am hopeful that it will be granted, and that affirmative action will be taken.

Does this mean that substantial grants will be made from the discretionary fund to Alaska in the next 2 years? Not at all. It means that Alaska will have a chance, together with every other State, to request such funds. But I am confident that the high urgency of the need for runway extensions here at Anchorage and at Fairbanks, plus other airport needs in Alaska, are recognized by the FAA and will receive appropriate consideration from that agency of the Federal Government. In this connection, I cannot speak too highly of the splendid cooperation which has and is being given to us in the Federal Aviation Agency from General Quesada and Jim Pyle on down. Uniformly, they have been understanding, helpful and possessed of a vigor and will to advance the cause of Alaska aviation.

Taking a look back, you may be interested to know that from the 1947 fiscal year through fiscal year 1959, $7,284,904 had been made available as Federal allocations to Alaska. With this money 38 projects have been physically and financially completed, 12 are physically completed but awaiting financial payment from the Federal Government, 19 are now under construction and should be completed before October this year and 13 are programed for construction.

But even if the discretionary fund amendment becomes law, we shall be operating under a jerry-built stopgap arrangement. The airport program which was extended to mid-1961 is by no means a wholly adequate program to meet the Nation's jet age needs. It is a program that was veto proofed to meet most of the President's objections and to assure the country that the airport program would not expire completely. I think that you will all recall that the President vetoed a new airport program in 1958.

I look forward to passage of a much better and more comprehensive program under the new administration that will take office in 1961. One point of that program must be treatment of Alaska and Hawaii on an equal footing with the other 48 States.

Senator GRUENING, Representative RIVERS, and I were pleased to have been able to help our State government work out arrangements for the change of hands of the two international airports. This change should be completed in the next year. In the meantime, the FAA will operate the airports as the agent of the State.

In addition, the smaller intermediate airports held by the FAA are to be transferred to the State gradually.

When these transitions are completed, the State of Alaska will be operating one of the most extensive and busiest airport systems in the country. It will still need plenty of improvement in the future. We in Congress will do our best to see that it is as adequately supported by Federal grants as any other State's.

When two-motored aircraft first came into use in Alaska, Alaska pilots first went into uniform. I can remember ever so vividly those great big, marvelous Lockheed Electras, which must have carried 12 or 14 passengers and which opened up an entirely new era in Alaska aviation. The pilots denounced the uniforms they were required to wear with an understanding and ability to use the language comparable to that of a cowpuncher trying to lasso a balky steer. But I always thought that secretly they were proud and pleased as could be. Those were the days when on landing the passengers were told to remain in their seats until the pilot and copilot had made leisurely and grand exit from the plane.

Today it is otherwise. But the aura of romance, of accomplishment, of derring-do, of pioneering, of adventuring in the far places, still surrounds the Alaska aviator. They are successors to those elder giants of the Yukon of the gold stampede days. Romance, mystery, physical daring and hardihood—all of these are elements that go into the makeup of the true pioneer, wherever he is found at whatever time in history. For example, I cannot think of Ray Peterson as the president of a successful airline which is a constituent member of the Association of Local Transport Airlines, so much as a helmet-and-goggle flyer in the perfect days of long ago.

So I would conclude here by saluting a brave race of men who have carved their place in Alaska history and whose exploits and vision have opened up for us—for all Americans—the vastness of the Alaska skies and the treasures of land and ocean that lie beneath.

Congressman Dollinger's Annual Report

OF

HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 2, 1959

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this is my 11th annual report to my constituents; I have sent them an annual report every year since coming to Congress. This report will be a résumé of my aims and efforts in behalf of the people I represent, as well as a summing up of the work of the 1st session of the 86th Congress. I have enjoyed representing the fine people of my district, and have considered it a privilege to strive for legislation beneficial to them as well as for the best interests of our country.

This Congress has accomplished a great amount of work, when we consider the overwhelming volume of business before it, the defense of our Nation being of primary concern. Vital domestic issues had to be considered as well as the Mutual Security Act, which fortifies our position with friendly nations and enables them to gain economic strength and protect themselves against aggressors.

In addition, we have had to grapple with the many crises engendered by the Soviet menace and the continuing cold war, as well as the explosive situations prevalent in many corners of the earth. Israel's position remains untenable and insecure regardless of the tremendous sacrifices of her people, their ability and industry, for her enemies still threaten to destroy her. I have lost no opportunity to urge that she be given all possible aid, for Israel is our bastion of democracy in the Middle East; she is our friend and ally; she deserves all that we can do to help her.

LABOR

This country's millions of workers await with great anxiety the final provisions of the highly controversial labor bill. At this writing, we do not know what the law will provide, as the Senate and House bills are in conference. We do know that as usual, Republicans favored management, and they, together with the southern bloc, succeeded in passing the Landrum-Griffin bill in the House. This has been labeled a bill which would "kill" the union movement; it has been charged that it was "probably authored by representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers." It has also been charged that a deal was made between Republicans and certain southern Democrats—that the Republicans would stymie action on civil-rights legislation in return for southern votes in favor of the Republican-sponsored Landrum-Griffin bill. I voted against this bill, the effect of which would throw the weight of the Federal Government on the side of management and would inflict punishment on the millions of honest, law-abiding men and women who belong to unions.

I favored a strong and constructive labor reform bill, which would protect union members and end abuses; I shall continue to fight against any labor bill which is punitive, which penalizes innocent workers, and which would deprive labor of any of its hard-won battles and advances. I hope that we shall have the opportunity to consider a final bill which will provide union members with all necessary safeguards and which will not tip the Taft-Hartley scales still more in favor of employers and against workers.

For many years, I have introduced bills to increase the minimum hourly wage from $1 to $1.25. I urged action on my bill, pointing out that millions of our people are merely existing; they live in substandard conditions because they are underpaid and because high living costs and high taxes make it impossible to provide their families and themselves with barest necessities.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Hope for passage of an effective civil rights bill at the present session of Congress grows dimmer; this is a severe blow to all who recognize the great need for such legislation. The 1957 civil rights right-to-vote bill is virtually ineffective; it needs teeth. Unless the Civil Rights Commission is given some real power, Negroes will go into the 1960 elections as voteless as ever. The President wants the Commission extended for 2 more years. This amounts to only a token gesture on his part, when we consider that he has yet to make an earnest plea for strong civil rights legislation. The Republicans are responsible for failure to vote a civil rights bill out of committee; if the Republicans were sincere in their campaign promises regarding civil rights, Members of Congress would have had the opportunity to vote on a good bill long before this, but so far, the Republican members of the committee in charge have withheld their support. The Attorney General must have authority to seek Federal court injunctions to enforce school desegregation and civil rights generally, and legislation to give him such authority should be given priority.

I have introduced strong civil rights bills to end the unconscionable discrimination, harassment, intimidation, and other human indecencies which are being inflicted upon a vast segment of our population. We cannot claim to have true democracy in our country, equality of men, equality of opportunity, freedom as guaranteed by our Constitution, until every vestige of discrimination because of race, color, or religion is abolished.

HOUSING

The President's veto of the first housing bill passed during the present session of Congress came as a great shock to me. In my opinion, his action was not only ill advised but was unconscionable, when we consider that countless Americans now merely exist in substandard dwellings, and that they must rely on the help of the Federal Government for public housing.

We have now passed a second housing bill and it is to be hoped that it will become law. The bill provides for urban renewal grants; 37,000 additional public housing units, loan programs for construction of college classrooms and dormitories, and housing for elderly persons. This represents a constructive and vitally needed program, but it only begins to meet the minimum standards we should set for American living.

IMMIGRATION

I, with other members of the New York Democratic delegation, introduced an Immigration and Citizenship Act to supersede the present Immigration and Nationality Act, known as the McCarran-Walter Act. It has long been recognized that the present law is discriminatory, unfair, and undemocratic. Under our proposal there will be no discrimination based on national origin or race, no classification of U.S. citizens into two categories, native born and naturalized. There will be no additional grounds for loss of U.S. citizenship by naturalized citizens except those that apply to native-born citizens. Many other necessary provisions are also included.

I hoped that, in view of the fact that the United States joined with other free countries in the United Nations in sponsoring a proposal for a World Refugee Year, and inasmuch as our attention was directed toward those unfortunates so desperately in need of a homeland, Congress would pass legislation liberalizing our immigration laws. However, that hope has been dashed also, and we continue to shirk our duty toward mankind while other nations, less able to sacrifice than ours, are opening their hearts and doors to the unfortunate, the homeless, the innocent victims of wars and oppression.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

Democrats are rightfully proud of their sincere efforts and great accomplishments. Their aim has always been to afford the help which the people need. By contrast, we find the Republicans still indulging in their deceitful promises and then sabotaging or ignoring the legislation which would provide for the very benefits they advocate by word only. As witness the deplorable plight of our public school system. The administration has, as usual, called attention to the desperate conditions, but has made no effectual moves to correct those conditions. There is a shortage now of about 140,000 classrooms throughout the United States. There is a great shortage of teachers. The administration is primarily to blame that this grave problem has once again been swept under the rug and that about 10 million American children are doomed to overcrowded and obsolescent classrooms in the richest Nation on earth.

SOCIAL SECURITY, PROBLEMS OF THE AGED, AND OTHER IMPORTANT LEGISLATION

I have been happy to support legislation liberalizing benefits under the Social Security Act and have introduced bills to provide further benefits. Among the latter are bills to remove the limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits under the act; to provide that full benefits thereunder, when based upon the attainment of retirement age, will be payable to men at age 60 and to women at age 55; and to eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained the age of 50 in order to become entitled to disability insurance benefits.

I also introduced a bill to provide insurance against the costs of hospital, nursing home, and surgical service for persons eligible for old-age and survivors insurance benefits. The protection offered by this bill is vitally needed by those many thousands of our older people who now cannot afford necessary medical, nursing, or hospital care; they cannot obtain or afford private insurance and they cannot meet the expense of illness. Costs of such care continue to rise, and the Federal Government must act to protect all those who are in dire need of such assistance.

Older workers and their problems have continued to receive my attention, and I reintroduced my resolution which would end existing bias against the hiring of older workers, and which would assist them in maintaining their rightful and dignified place as useful members of society.

I have introduced bills to lighten the taxload; to repeal excise taxes; to grant additional income tax exemptions to those supporting a dependent who is permanently handicapped; to those receiving retirement annuities or pensions; to those who are physically handicapped; to increase the personal income tax exemption of taxpayers.

Veterans deserve all possible assistance, and I have been happy to support legislation in their behalf at every opportunity, as well as to introduce bills beneficial to them. I am gratified that the liberalized veterans' pension bill, recently passed, has been signed into law.

I voted for the Federal employee health program bill and am pleased that it passed. I trust it will be signed into law. This will enable Federal employees to purchase protection at a cost which is within their means, from the unanticipated and oppressive costs of medical care, as well as the often crushing expense of so-called catastrophic illness or serious injury. The bill is designed to close the gap which now exists and bring the Government abreast of most private employers who have for many years been establishing and operating contributory health benefit programs for their employees.

I was happy to procure passage of my bill in the House to provide for the honorary designation of Saint Ann's churchyard in the city of New York as a national historic site. This culminated 11 years of unrelenting work on my part regarding the designation of Saint Ann's churchyard. Last year, I thought my work was finished when the House passed the bill, but it was defeated in the Senate committee. I renewed my efforts again this year; it again passed the House, and at this moment the bill is once more bottled up in the Senate committee. I can only hope that the Senate will take favorable action.

CONCLUSION

Space limitation prevents my discussing all the subjects important to my constituents. I hope the foregoing will show, to some extent, what I have endeavored to accomplish and what the 86th Congress has done so far.

My congressional office at 938 Simpson Street is open daily, and my constituents are welcome to call there and discuss matters of interest to them. I am always pleased to see them, to receive their letters, and to do all I can to be helpful.

SENATE

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1959

(Legislative day of Monday, August 31, 1959)

The Senate met at 9:30 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of life and light, whose love is unfailing and in whose mercy there's a wideness like the wideness of the sea.

At this wayside shrine of prayer set up so long ago by those who launched our ship of state and hallowed across the long years we lift up our souls unto Thee.

We come unto our father's God
Their rock is our salvation
The eternal arms their dear abode
We make our habitation
We seek Thee as Thy saints have sought
In every generation.

In this forum of deliberation and debate amid the din and clash of differing opinions may we here unite in keeping always a constant sense of the eternal which will save us from spiritual decay, from moral cowardice, and from any betrayal of the highest public good.

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, September 2, 1959, was dispensed with.

PREMIER KHRUSHCHEV'S VISIT—RESOLUTION

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate on September 1, on the 20th anniversary of the invasion of Poland by Germany, followed, 16 days later, by the invasion of Poland by Russia.

It was my privilege, on September 1 of this year, to be in Warsaw, Poland, attending the annual meeting of the Interparliamentary Union. While there, I also had an opportunity to discuss briefly, with several citizens of Warsaw, matters of deep concern to them.

During these brief conversations, I heard expressions of sorrow because of the yoke of bondage placed upon the nation of Poland. Yet there was also a grim determination to look forward toward a time when freedom would be enjoyed.

In Delaware, the Polish people also express deep concern because of the situation which encompasses their ancestral nation; and in recognition thereof, they adopted a resolution in opposition to the forthcoming visit of Soviet Premier Khrushchev to the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted by the executive board of the Council of Polish Societies and Clubs in the State of Delaware, and the Delaware division of the Polish-American Congress, at their joint meeting held August 25, 1959, be inserted in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the executive board of the Council of the Polish Societies and Clubs in the State of Delaware and of the Delaware division of the Polish American Congress at its meeting, held on Tuesday evening, August 25, 1959, at the Polish American Civic Association Hall, 618 South Franklin Street, Wilmington, Del.:

"Whereas President Eisenhower recently lamented the apathy of many Americans in the face of the Soviet menace. He could not understand why the tyranical regime in Moscow, dedicated to world revolution, was treated so indifferently by many citizens of the Republic; and

"Whereas our U.S. Congress passed resolutions, a Captive Nations Week was organized. The churches were solicited to join prayers to proclamations. The plight of the captive nations was mooned over and moaned over, but just for a day. The Captive Nations Week proposal has been a fraud; and

"Whereas the President's action, inviting the head of the Soviet regime to be a guest of the United States, could not by any chance be called apathetic. Rather it will appear to many as a colossal swallowing of principle, a betrayal of our civilization, a misfortune destructive of the loyalty we owe to American youth who have perished at the hands of Soviet treachery, and an insult to the millions of people enslaved by the dictatorship; and

"Whereas by inviting Khrushchev, is the President backing down from the historic U.S. refusal to recognize the Kremlin's rights to keep Albania, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland and Rumania in chains? If he has not written off these tragic countries and their enslaved peoples, will the President kindly explain just what he has done in this regard? and

"Whereas Khrushchev, has on his hands the blood of millions of people who were murdered under his direction, he is responsible for the suffering of millions more in concentration camps and slave labor camps. He is the persecutor of Cardinal Mindszenty, Archbishop Baran and countless other churchmen of various faiths. He holds under cruel tyranny a dozen captive nations in Eastern Europe. He has refused to make slightest concession in the interest of justice and peace in the world. Yet our Government proposes to bestow upon Khrushchev all of the cordialities, courtesies and kindnesses of the American people; and

"Whereas Khrushchev wants to come to the United States for two reasons, both of them to his advantage, pictures of Khrushchev, being wined and dined by Eisenhower and other U.S. leaders will be shown all over the world to indicate to the captive nations that there is no hope for them because we have made friends with their slave masters; and

"Whereas we are gravely disturbed by the invitation extended to Mr. Khrushchev to visit our country. In our judgment this invitation cannot but be deplored as another Russian cold-war victory which Moscow is already celebrating as Khrushchev's triumph, this planned action appears now as a cynical sequel to our first observance of Captive Nations Week; and

"Resolved, That the President's invitation to Khrushchev deserves the strongest opposition from Christian people in our land. Before God it is morally wrong. We cannot expect almighty God to help us in our struggle for survival when we court the chief spokesman of the Devil who repudiates God. The resistance to this visit should be so great that Khrushchev will decline to come just as he did in Sweden. Our Nation is being deceived; and further

"Resolved, That millions of Americans of Polish ancestry know the background of Nikita, that is why we object to his visit here. It is an insult to all subjugated nations for whom America is the ideal of democracy, a beacon of hope; and be it further

"Resolved, We respectfully urge you, Mr. President, with all of the earnestness we can convey, to reconsider your decision; and to insist that the Soviet Premier postpone his visit to our country until he has shown by his treatment of the captive nations and their enslaved peoples, that he is no longer the enemy of freedom and of ourselves; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to the President and to the Vice-President of the United States and to the Members of the U.S. Congress representing the State of Delaware."

[SEAL] CASIMIR CHETKOWSKI,
President.

Attest:

VINCENT J. KOWALEWSKI,
Secretary.

THE JAYCEE COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—TELEGRAM

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I received from J. G. Quandt, president of the North Dakota Jaycees, Fargo, N. Dak., relating to the Jaycee community development program.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., August 27, 1959.

Senator WILLIAM LANGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The North Dakota Jaycees are very interested in the Resolution 173 explaining and endorsing the community development program of the U.S. Junior Chamber of Commerce. The adoption of this resolution would be very important because then it wouldn't be just the Jaycees that will be aware of the large scope of this program. Look favorably upon this Senate Resolution 173.

Sincerely,

J. G. QUANDT,
President, North Dakota Jaycees.

INCREASED FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX—LETTER AND RESOLUTION

Dak., enclosing a resolution adopted by that organization, relating to increased Federal gasoline taxes. I ask unanimous consent that the letter and resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GASOLINE TAX ADMINISTRATORS CONFERENCE,
Pierre, S. Dak.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: I enclose copy of resolution which was adopted by unanimous vote of our conference at its annual meeting held June 25 and 26, last, in Rapid City, S. Dak., for your information. You will note from the reading of this resolution that our conference feels very strongly about suggestions recently made to increase the Federal gasoline tax.

In addition to the reasons set forth in the resolution for opposition to any increase in the Federal gasoline tax, it was brought out in discussions about the subject that any further increase in the Federal gasoline tax will raise further problems in the States affecting gasoline tax refunds on both State gasoline taxes as well as the Federal gasoline tax. The consensus of the meeting appeared to be that such Federal gasoline tax increase would bring the tax on gasoline, throughout the States represented at the meeting, to such a high level that the temptation to evade the tax would be much greater and could very possibly in the future bring about a chaotic condition in the collection of State gasoline taxes. It appeared from the discussion that any such increase might, in fact, bring about little if any additional highway revenue because of the pressure upon gasoline tax refunds.

I note that hearings will soon be had by the House Ways and Means Committee on the proposed Federal gasoline tax increase and hope this information will be of benefit to you and properly inform you of the thinking of our conference.

Membership of our conference is composed of the motor fuel tax collectors and also tax commissioners or revenue commissioners of the following Midwestern States: Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming. Tax representatives of the oil industry are likewise participants in the conference meetings and discussions.

Very truly yours,

E. W. STEPHENS,
Secretary.

RESOLUTION 3

Whereas high State and Federal gasoline taxes already are unduly penalizing the motoring public and raising the specter of gasoline tax evasion; and

Whereas Interstate Highway trust fund revenues would be sufficient if diversions of automotive excise taxes were halted; and

Whereas the recommended 50 percent increase in the Federal gasoline tax will further usurp a field of taxation which should be left to the States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Northwest Central States Gasoline Tax Administrators Conference go on record as definitely opposed to any increase in the Federal gasoline tax.

FEDERAL AID TO SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a school construction bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2637) to authorize Federal grant assistance to school districts in financing a 4-year program of construction of urgently needed elementary and secondary public school facilities, introduced by Mr. COOPER (for himself and Mr. JAVITS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, several aid-to-education bills have been introduced in the Senate this year, including the Murray-Metcalf bill (S. 2), the administration's proposal (S. 1016), and the bill sponsored by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] and other Senators (S. 8) which was reported last week to the full Committee on Labor and Public Welfare by the Subcommittee on Education.

Our purpose is to lay before the Senate, for the consideration of Senators who believe that school construction must proceed in less fortunate areas of our country, a proposal which we believe could be enacted by the Congress, and which we hope the President would approve.

Mr. President, in the short time I have I shall not undertake to detail all the provisions of the bill. Its main provisions are these:

The Federal Government would join with the States in a matching grant program to initiate $4 billion worth of school construction in needy districts over a 4-year period.

Each year for 4 years, the Federal Government would commit itself to provide annual grants to the States representing the Federal share of the annual principal and interest on $1 billion worth of school bonds. This construction allocation would be apportioned among the States on the basis of school population, per capita income, and school financing efforts.

We believe that this proposal has advantages over the school construction bill (S. 8) which has been reported to the full Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare by its Subcommittee on Education. In the first place, it would provide for the construction of 100,000 schoolrooms in the United States over a period of 4 years, as compared to 50,000 classrooms which would be provided by S. 8. The admitted classroom shortage in the Nation is 140,000 schoolrooms.

Our bill has a second advantage. It would stretch out the payments for the Federal assistance to school construction in needy areas over a period of years, which would make the burden bearable, both by the Federal Government and the States. Essentially, it is a guarantee by the Federal Government that it will help meet the annual principal and interest payments on bonds issued by local school districts. Over a period of 20 to 30 years the Federal Government would, through annual grants, share the cost of paying off the local school bonds, in effect helping to pay for the schools while they are being used. The Federal cost of this part of the program would start at about $27 million a year, and rise to $86 million a year by the fourth year, continuing at that level until the local school bonds are paid off.

Our bill has a third advantage. It would make possible stretching out the payments of the States over the same period of years. There is a tendency to think only of the burden of expenditures on the Federal Government, and to forget that requiring local districts or States to put up large matching amounts in a short period may impose a severe burden on them. I doubt very much whether local districts or the States could match $500 million a year for the next 2 years, as proposed by the bill of my distinguished colleague from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA].

A fourth feature of the bill the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and I have introduced, which is not present in any other bill, is that it would help those needy districts which have no funds, and which are unable to issue bonds, to finance their urgently needed classroom construction. We have included a provision that, for the first 2 years if the school district is unable by reason of a State or local debt limit to issue school bonds, the Federal Government will advance its full share of the total cost of building the classrooms, until such time as the debt limitations can be removed and the district joins the regular program.

Fifth, our bill also contains a highly important provision, which is the child of the mind of my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. This is a wholly new provision, which I believe no school construction bill before now has included. It deals with the efforts of the States to raise teachers' salaries, and I am sure he will speak of this feature.

Since sputnik went up, there has been been a great deal of talk about raising the quality of education in this country, about providing schools, and increasing teachers' salaries. With the exception of the National Defense Education Act of last year, very little has been done. We are offering this bill and intend to offer it in the full Committee on Labor, in the belief that it provides a means, bearable by both the Federal Government and the States, to break the back of the problem of school construction.

Later in this week, I will introduce a bill, simple in its proposals, one not calling for large expenditures, which I believe could be used to encourage improving the quality of curriculums, and raising the standards of scholarship of pupils, and thus have effect to improve the quality of our educational system.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I point out that the fifth point about the bill, the raising of teachers' salaries, is very important. Teachers place great store by it, and so do communities.

Under the terms of the bill, the States which put forth the best efforts in raising teachers' salaries would have a more favorable matching formula with the Federal Government than the States which do not. The aid would be based upon the capabilities of the States, predicated upon per capita income. Under present circumstances, that is the best way to do something about teachers' salaries in what is essentially a school construction bill.

Mr. COOPER. I thank my colleague, who serves with me on the Subcommittee on Education, and who has been so active in urging better schools and more adequate salaries for teachers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a brief statement explaining the purposes of the bill, a statement of the school construction which could be programed in each State under this plan, and a comparison with other school construction bills before the committee.

Mr. President, I think it is also appropriate at this time to call attention again to the energy, devotion and deep belief of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] who has proposed S. 8. After offering an amended bill in the subcommittee, which was not accepted, I voted to report his bill to the full committee, for I believe that the Congress should act. But with my colleague, Senator JAVITS, I sincerely believe the bill we offer today would be more effective, and most important, has chance of being enacted.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUTLINE OF COOPER-JAVITS BILL, S. 2637—A $4 BILLION, 4-YEAR PROGRAM TO BUILD 100,000 CLASSROOMS

The Federal Government would join with the States in a matching grant program to initiate $4 billion worth of school construction in needy districts over a 4-year period.

Each year for 4 years, the Federal Government would commit itself to provide annual grants to the States representing the Federal share of the annual principal and interest on $1 billion worth of school bonds. This construction allocation would be apportioned among the States on the basis of school population, per capita income, and school financing efforts. The Federal share of grants for principal and interest would be $27 million in the first full year of operation. By the fourth year the Federal grants would reach a maximum level of $86 million, which would continue for a 20- to 30-year period until the bonds are paid off.

A State would finance its share of its construction allotment either by putting up cash (in the form of capital grants or interest-deferred loans) or, like the Federal Government, committing itself to pay its share of the principal and interest on bonds issued by needy school districts. The State would set construction priorities among districts on the basis of relative need. For the first year of the program, matching funds could be provided by the local districts, instead of the States, in order to get the program underway promptly.

The Federal matching share would range from $3 of Federal money for $2 of State money to $2 Federal money for $3 State money. Those States making a teacher salary effort (in terms of State income) substantially greater than the national average would be eligible for premium matching, with the Federal share up to 60 percent. States falling below teacher salary expenditures consistent with their income and public school population, would receive Federal matching under 50 percent but not less than 40 percent.

Any district which has reached its legal debt limit and is unable to obtain funds could participate in the program without delay during the first 2 years by obtaining Federal capital grants equal to the Federal share of the cost of the school construction project. Such districts could qualify for capital grants upon State assurance that it will seek the amendments to State laws which are necessary to enable the school districts to borrow additional funds. An estimated one-fourth of all districts qualifying for help would become eligible for capital grants, adding about $125 million to the Federal cost in each of the first 2 years of the program. With the proceeds of bonds issued after the State takes action to permit additional borrowing, the districts could return to the Treasury amounts equal to the Federal capital grants paid to them, and their annual installments of principal and interest on these bonds would then be paid by the Federal Government and the State under the regular program. If the State law is not amended and amounts equal to the capital grants are not returned, the State would have its allocation reduced proportionately in the third year.

Thus, the program would initiate $4 billion worth of school construction (about 100,000 classrooms) in needy districts which could not otherwise provide adequate educational facilities, at the rate of about 25,000 classrooms a year.

Figures are for total construction allocated to each State. Allocation based on school population, per capita income, and school financing efforts. One billion dollars' worth of construction (an estimated 25,000 classrooms) programed each year for 4 years.

Figures are not Federal share of construction costs. The Federal matching share would would range from $3 of Federal money for $2 of State money, to $2 Federal money for $3 State money, according to States teacher salary support index. Those States making a teacher salary effort (in terms of State income) substantially greater than the national average would be eligible for Federal matching up to 60 percent.

Teacher salary support index is computed by dividing State teacher salary expenditures per public school child by State income per child of school age. A low-income State devoting as high a proportion of its income to teachers' salaries as a higher income State (paying larger salaries) will have the same index.

Number of classrooms based on $40,000 estimated national average cost, including sites, associated facilities, and equipment. Actual cost varies from State to State.

Four-year totals projected from first-year allocations.

AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION RELATING TO REPRESENTATION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AND ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide the residents of the District of Columbia with the right to vote for electors for President and Vice President and for three delegates to the House of Representatives.

I have joined with my colleagues in introducing this measure in order to avoid any difficulties as the result of minor differences in the resolutions on this subject which we have previously separately introduced. Our objective is to obtain action as soon as possible to bestow full democracy on American citizens who live in our Nation's Capital.

I have been assured by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], chairman of the Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the subcommittee will endeavor to hold hearings on this measure during the coming week. I hope the hearings can be speedily concluded.

Mr. President, I trust the day is not too far distant when this wholly unreasonable discrimination against the people of the District of Columbia will be forever removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States granting representation in the House of Representatives and in the electoral college to the District of Columbia, introduced by Mr. KEATING (for himself, Mr. BEALL, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I have just 1 minute?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I had not concluded on that subject.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to make a comment on the subject.

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I wish to say I appreciate the courtesy of the distinguished Senator from New York in not pressing his earlier decision to attach that amendment to the so-called poll tax amendment.

I wish to say that it will make me much more sympathetic to the Senator's amendment because he has taken that position. I think it will probably clarify the two issues for the Senate and for everyone who has deep concern about both situations.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the remarks and the courtesy of the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, it was my conclusion that one might interfere with the other. I had earlier stated I would offer this as an amendment to the anti-poll-tax constitutional amendment, but on reflection and after conference with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] I decided this was the better course. It is more cleancut, but still permits both matters to be presented to the full Committee on the Judiciary at the same time.

As the Senator from Florida knows, I am wholeheartedly and enthusiastically behind the constitutional amendment which he has proposed, and I should not want to do anything which might interfere with its progress through the Congress.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I appreciate the consideration shown by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator.

PRINTING AS A SENATE DOCUMENT THE STUDY ENTITLED "TENSIONS IN COMMUNIST CHINA"

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on January 28 of this year, I announced to my colleagues in the Senate that I had asked the legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress and the staff of the Committee on Foreign Relations to undertake a study of tensions in Communist China. Such a study has now been prepared by J. Clement Lapp of the Foreign Affairs Division of the Legislative Reference Service, and is in the process of being readied for publication by the staff of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

As Members of the Senate will recall, several years ago, when I was serving as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, a similar series of studies was prepared which proved to be most useful. I believe that "Tensions in Communist China" will likewise prove useful and of interest to Members of the Senate and to the public generally. I am, therefore, submitting a resolution to provide that this study be printed as a Senate document, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 186) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That "Tensions in Communist China," prepared at the request of Senator ALEXANDER WILEY by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, be printed as a Senate document, and that one thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRESERVATION OF CERTAIN SHORELINE AREAS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] has requested that his name be added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 2460) to save and preserve, for public use and benefit, certain portions of shoreline areas of the United States, and for other purposes, introduced by me, for myself and other Senators on July 29, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Minnesota be added to the list of cosponsors, and included on the bill when it is next printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF WILLIAM A. M. BURDEN TO BE AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY TO BELGIUM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nomination of William A. M. Burden, of New York, to be Ambassador to Belgium.

In accordance with the committee rule, the pending nomination may not be considered prior to the expiration of 6 days.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON ENFRANCHISEMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, at a recent meeting of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, there was considerable discussion of several proposed amendments with respect to enfranchisement of the District of Columbia. The proposed amendments were embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 60, introduced by the junior Senator from South Dakota, Senate Joint Resolution 71, introduced by the junior Senator from Maryland, and Senate Joint Resolution 134, introduced by the junior Senator from New York.

These three proposed amendments were discussed during recent hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 126, but the subcommittee believed that the hearings were not complete enough for action to be taken on them. The subcommittee also believed that action could be expedited if one resolution, acceptable to the three sponsors of the different resolutions, could be worked out. Such a resolution (S.J. Res. 138) has been worked out, and it was introduced today.

The Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments will hold a hearing on Senate Joint Resolution 138 on Wednesday, September 9, at 2 p.m. in the Senate caucus room—room 318, Old Senate Office Building. Persons who desire to testify or place a statement in the record should contact the subcommittee's counsel, Mr. Bernard Fensterwald, Jr., room 252, Old Senate Office Building, telephone Capitol 4–3121, extension 5581.

PHILADELPHIA YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Senate passed and sent to the other body a bill establishing a Youth Conservation Corps which is modeled on the old Civilian Conservation Corps of the 1930's. A similar program has been in effect in the city of Philadelphia for a short time.

I ask unanimous consent that an article in the Philadelphia Inquirer pointing out the success of Philadelphia's Youth Conservation Corps may appear in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSERVATION CORPS FOR WAYWARD YOUTHS A SUCCESS, SAYS CHIEF

The Youth Conservation Corps, a city program that enables wayward youths to earn money and, at the same time, become better citizens is working out well, according to Dr. Johannes Hoeber, in charge of the project for the department of welfare.

Dr. Hoeber reported that since the program began July 1 only one boy in the corps was arrested. Six of the 50 boys dropped out, he said. The boy who was arrested has returned to the corps, Dr. Hoeber said.

SEVENTY-FIVE PERCENT GET TOP PAY

Under the program, youth guidance agencies recommend boys to the corps. The boys are currently working in Pennypack Park, clearing underbrush and removing fallen trees.

The boys are paid according to their performance. Dr. Hoeber said that 75 percent of the corps earned an excellent rating and have been paid 60 cents an hour. Other ratings are good, satisfactory, and unsatisfactory. For these ratings the respective pay scales are 40, 30, and 20 cents an hour.

Performance is judged by attendance, punctuality, discipline, and quality of work. The corps put in a 40-hour week, Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

LONG WAITING LIST

Dr. Hoeber said since the waiting list is long, each boy's participation in the program is limited to 6 months. He said the corps has 10 times as many applicants as it can handle under the present budget.

"With our present grants it is impossible for us to expand and we expect no new grants from the city in 1960," Dr. Hoeber said. "However, the boys get along splendidly and, more important, are staying out of trouble.

"The job is definitely not easy. The boys work hard and are learning the merits of industry. At the same time, they are avoiding the contacts which might get them into trouble."

RISING INTEREST RATES

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I share the concern which so often has been expressed in recent months about the problem of rising interest rates, but I feel it is important to keep this problem in perspective as only one part of the general problem of price inflation which can have such serious consequences.

Discussing this subject last June before the Home Builders Association of Virginia, I said there was need for both Federal fiscal restraint and general monetary restraint to prevent further erosion of the dollar's purchasing power.

Because of the continuing importance of this problem, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point excerpts from my remarks to the Virginia Home Builders.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Unfortunately, the Federal Reserve Board in its policy of monetary restraint has received no support from Federal fiscal policy. At a time when the Federal Government should have a budget surplus or at least a balanced budget, it confronts the economy with a staggering deficit which requires the Treasury to enter the capital markets for new funds as a tremendous borrowing force—to compete with all other sectors of the economy in an ever-growing demand for borrowed funds.

A policy of monetary restraint, in the face of the normal credit demands marking any rapid expansion, is bound to raise the structure of interest rates. But when the Treasury adds its tremendous credit demand to the demands of other borrowers, we experience, as we do now, an even greater upward thrust in interest rates.

I share the feelings of those who deplore the rise in interest rates. I am fully aware of the difficulties imposed on the Treasury by rising rates of interest. I sympathize with the small businessman who finds that tight money and higher borrowing costs may pinch severely.

Of course, the most obvious impact of the rising market structure of interest rates is the unfortunate drying up of FHA and VA mortgage money when the market rates rise above the FHA and VA ceiling rates. You home builders have suffered this blow before and may face a similar situation in the near future. In the face of rising rates, FHA and VA mortgages will be downgraded by the market just as Government bonds are downgraded today with their 4¼ percent statutory ceiling.

The best solution of the problem of sharply rising interest rates would be a drastic curtailment of Treasury borrowing needs. Although I have fought and will continue to fight for restraints in Government spending programs, I must be realistic and admit that for the duration of the cold war defense requirements will continue at a high level.

Therefore, if in the immediate future the size of our defense budget makes it impractical to sharply reduce Government credit demands, continued high interest rates must be regarded as a necessary price to be paid for the failures of fiscal policy and the avoidance of inflation.

Proposals to have the Federal Reserve hold down interest rates by purchases of Government securities seem to me highly unrealistic. They overlook the fact that to halt the upward trend of interest rates in this expanding period of our economy would require a tremendous volume of open market purchases of Government bonds. This could not be done without promoting inflation and, indeed, without converting the Federal Reserve System into an engine of inflation.

Remember, that when the Federal Reserve purchases Government bonds, it does not actually pay out currency but merely sets up a credit for the Federal Government in the form of a deposit and that deposit, like other deposits, requires only a limited reserve and can be the basis for other loans. Actually, each dollar of open market purchases of Government bonds by the Federal Reserve makes available about $6 for additional loans—a tremendous inflationary factor.

We found out during and following World War II the difficulties involved when the Federal Reserve Board tried to peg interest rates on Government obligations. The rates were held down but a dangerous inflation developed under the blanket of direct price, wage and materials controls and when these wartime controls were removed the inflation broke out and threatened to destroy our free economy.

Even if we accepted the inflationary consequences, it is doubtful whether the Federal Reserve System could peg interest rates on Government obligations under normal peacetime conditions, because the inflationary influence of such huge increases in credit would accelerate a further diversion of savings from investments in bonds and other fixed income obligations into stocks and other equities. It would lead to speculative buying of commodities and securities to beat higher costs and prices in the future. Thus, such efforts to stabilize interest rates would have a reverse effect and would push up interest rates in most sectors of the credit markets, including mortgages, even if the Government obligations were protected.

I need not spell out the evils of inflation. You are well aware of the price rises and the corresponding decline of the purchasing power of the dollar that has been going on since 1939.

Rising interest rates in a period of monetary restraint are cost burdens to be sure, but it is useful to remember that a 1 percent general price increase applied to consumer exenditures now at the rate of $300 billion would mean an added annual cost of $3 billion.

GENERAL POWER'S BOOK AND THE PEOPLE'S RIGHT TO KNOW

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, based on the people's right to know, for some time I have protested against the efforts of this administration to prevent the American people from being aware of the true relative strength of this country as compared to the strength of the Sino-Soviet Communists.

Months ago, a book written by Gen. Thomas S. Power, one of the world's two foremost authorities on strategic airpower, was sent over to the Department of Defense with the recommendation of the Air Force but its publication has now been denied.

The more I get into this matter the more disturbed I am because it would seem but further deliberate effort to keep the truth from the people about matters which vitally affect their security.

Mr. President, the book is composed of five parts.

The table of contents is as follows:

Preface.
"Part I. The Threat."
1. "Atomic Revolution."
2. "The Communist Threat."
3. "People, Pawns, and Party."
4. "What Price Peace?"
"Part II. The Challenge of Deterrence."
5. "Aspects of Deterrence."
6. "The Deterrent Role of SAC."
7. "The Free World's Deterrent System."
8. "Deterrence and Limited War."
"Part III. The Road to War."
9. "Elements of Preparedness."
10. "The Causes of Total War."
11. "Nuclear Threat and Military Strategy."
"Part IV. The Nature of Nuclear War."
12. "The Problems of Tactical Warning."
13. "The Initial Airpower Battle."
14. "Fundamentals of Survival."
15. "Planning for Survival."
"Part V. The Tools for Survival."
16. "The Sliderule War."
17. "Strategic Weapons—Today and Tomorrow."
18. "Manpower Aspects in the Nuclear Age."
19. "The Ultimate Weapon."

Mr. President, the people have a great investment in General Power. They do not necessarily have to agree with what he believes, but they have the right to know his convictions.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the preface of this book be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the preface was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREFACE

When a military man airs his ideas for strengthening the Nation's defense effort, he is liable to be called a saber rattler and warmonger. Actually, he can render a greater service to the cause of peace than his detractors. For it is invariably the weak, not the strong, who court aggression and war.

There is, however, a growing awareness among the public that the military problems of survival are no longer the sole concern of the men in uniform and their civilian superiors. During the past few years, I have had the opportunity to discuss these problems with a great many people from every walk of life and every section of the country. Despite the diversity of their backgrounds and professions, all shared the intense desire to learn more about the threat that the Nation is facing and what they, individually and collectively, must do to meet that threat.

It was most encouraging to find so much real interest because I maintain that our citizens have not only the right but the urgent need to know the full truth about the problems that are of such vital importance to them. Indeed, I am more concerned about any attempt to keep unpleasant facts from the people than about their reaction to these facts. It has been my experience that the average American is not easily frightened nor discouraged and that, once he knows what is expected of him, no one and nothing can stop him.

In my discussions, I have endeavored always to present the facts as I knew them, frankly and in terms anyone could understand. To do so on a broader and more inclusive scale is the purpose of this book. It is, therefore, intended neither as a textbook nor as a vehicle for advancing startling new ideas and theories. It is intended mainly as a report to our stockholders—some 175 million of them.

Of course, a report on the military aspects of the global struggle between the free and Communist worlds can account for only one phase of the overall problem. However important, this phase has little significance unless it is viewed from the perspective of the overall problem. For this reason, I had to touch on certain political, economic, and related subjects. In addition, the unprecedented relationship between the various military and nonmilitary aspects of nuclear war requires frequent backtracking which, of necessity, makes for a considerable amount of repetition.

There is also the old bugaboo of military security. It is difficult to present a comprehensive and graphic picture of the current military situation without including information which, for reasons of security, must remain classified. I strongly believe in telling the public everything that can and should be told. But I believe even more strongly in the overriding importance of protecting military secrets. Just as closely guarded trade secrets are essential in business competition, protection of military secrets can spell the difference between victory and defeat in the martial competition among nations.

Last but not least, it is always safer to write about the past than the present—let alone the future. An author dealing with current events may be able to determine causes but he can, at best, only speculate about effects. Instead of the historian's hindsight, he must rely on foresight which is a rather risky and thankless job, especially if his subject is as complex and controversial as the problem of survival in the nuclear age. Moreover, if he thinks that he has acquired enough experience in his subject to write a book about it, he certainly cannot be sufficiently detached from this subject to set a striking example for objectivity.

In spite of such handicaps and limitations I decided to write this book because I sincerely believe that there is a need for it. To be sure, there is already an extensive literature of thorough and thought-provoking studies on every facet of nuclear strategy and policy. But this book was not written for the military or political scientist; it was written for the American people. It was written for them in the conviction that we cannot solve the problems entailed in our design for survival unless the people fully understand these problems and decide to do something about them.

This country has had problems before, and it has always managed to cope with them, once it gained the understanding and support of its citizens. Still, none of the dangers we have faced in the past can compare to the formidable threat of nuclear aggression which we are facing today. Nor will we ever again have the time to plan, to rally, and to act after the aggressor has struck. If he were to strike today, he would find us ready to strike back but ill prepared to ward off his blow.

These are some of the sober facts whose ominous significance must be impressed on the American people if we are to survive. For it is they, not the military or the statesmen, who will have to solve the Nation's problems.

THOMAS S. POWER,
General, USAF.

OFFUTT AIR FORCE BASE, NEBR.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a letter of yesterday, published in the Washington Post and Times Herald, entitled "The Power Book," with a thoughtful quotation from Thomas Jefferson, be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POWER BOOK

It is puzzling to read that the publication of a book by Gen. Thomas Power has been banned.

As Commander in Chief of the Air Forces Strategic Air Command, General Power is entrusted with what is probably the most important military assignment in the free world.

Surely he would not have been given his awesome responsibilities if his superiors did not have an excellent opinion of his integrity, judgment and professional skills. His friends and associates hold him in equally high regard.

Why should his book be banned?

One wonders if Thomas Jefferson wouldn't respond to this news story in the same spirit as when he wrote in 1814:

"I am mortified to be told that, in the United States of America, a book can become a subject of inquiry, and of criminal inquiry, too; that a question like this can be carried before a civil magistrate.

"Are we to have a censor whose imprimatur shall say what books may be sold, and what we may buy? Whose foot is to be the measure to which ours are all to be cut or stretched? It is an insult to our citizens to question whether they are rational beings.

"If DeBecourt's book is false in its facts, disprove them; if false in its reasoning, refute it. But, for God's sake, let us freely hear both sides, if we choose.

"The book is not likely to be much read if let alone, but, if persecuted, it will be generally read. Every man in the United States will think it a duty to buy a copy, in vindication of his right to buy and to read what he pleases."

DR. PAUL R. BEALL.

ANNAPOLIS.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR McCLELLAN

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I was not on the floor yesterday when the conference report on the labor bill was brought in, and when comments were made concerning it. Had I been, I should have joined with the majority leader and others in paying my respects to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the chairman of the select committee, which has labored so long and so hard over a period of 2½ years to bring about a labor union-management reform bill.

Certainly, the record of disclosures made by that committee under the Senator's untiring leadership through many, many difficult weeks and months is the principal reason why a bill satisfactory to both Houses appears to have been concluded as of yesterday.

So to JOHN MCCLELLAN, who has carried chiefly the burden of this very difficult investigation, I pay my respect, and offer my thanks as a citizen of the United States and as a U.S. Senator.

CHANGE OF NAME OF HUNGRY HORSE RESERVOIR TO KELLY LAKE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, yesterday I sent a letter to the Board on Geographic Names asking that the Hungry Horse Reservoir be officially designated Kelly Lake in honor of the late Harry J. "Hungry Horse" Kelly, former Montana newspaper publisher who sparked the local effort to have this dam constructed. I ask unanimous consent to have printed immediately following these remarks a copy of the letter which I sent to the Board, and an editorial about "Hungry Horse" Kelly which appeared in the Friday, August 28, 1959, issue of the Hungry Horse News.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., September 2, 1959.

MR. JEROME O. KILMARTIN,
Executive Secretary for Domestic Names, Board on Geographic Names, Geographical Survey, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KILMARTIN: I would like to propose for the consideration of the Board on Geographic Names that the name of Hungry Horse Reservoir on the south part of the Flathead River in northwestern Montana be changed to Kelly Lake, in honor of the late Harry J. "Hungry Horse" Kelly, former Montana newspaper publisher who contributed so much toward the construction of the dam which created the reservoir.

I enclose for the consideration of the Board an editorial appearing in the August 28, 1959, issue of the Hungry Horse News telling of the selection of the late Mr. Kelly for the Montana Press Hall of Fame. This article summarizes Mr. Kelly's untiring efforts on behalf of Hungry Horse Dam.

I would like to add a personal reminiscence to this editorial. In 1933 I was chairman of the Montana Advisory Board of the Public Works Administration. Mr. Kelly headed a delegation of civic leaders from the Flathead Valley who came to me and inquired about the possibility of getting Hungry Horse Dam under construction. At that time there was heavy unemployment but there were no plans for construction of this dam. Secretary of the Interior Ickes interested himself in the proposal and after some years, always with the local leadership of "Hungry Horse" Kelly, we were able to get this great dam constructed.

I believe that naming this reservoir after Mr. Kelly would be a most fitting tribute to a great citizen of my State. Senator MANSFIELD and Congressmen METCALF and ANDERSON join me in asking that the Board give favorable consideration to this request.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY,
U.S. Senator.

[From the Hungry Horse News, Columbia Falls, Mont., Aug. 28, 1959]

HUNGRY HORSE KELLY

The Montana State Press Association at its 74th annual meeting held at Lake Hotel in Yellowstone National Park last Saturday named Harry J. "Hungry Horse" Kelly to the Press Hall of Fame.

The hall of fame was started last year with the selection of three honored Montana publishers and the founder of the MSU School of Journalism. They were the late O. S. Warden of the Great Falls Tribune, the late Joseph D. Scanlan of the Miles City Star, Dr. J. H. Durston, early-day publisher of the Anaconda Standard, and Dean A. L. Stone.

Harry Kelly was nominated by T. J. Hocking, Glasgow, much-respected publisher of the Glasgow Courier for 45 years who retired last summer. We had the privilege of seconding the nomination.

Harry Kelly was born October 6, 1869 at Prairie du Chien, Wis. He attended Creighton University, Omaha, and came to Montana in 1888 establishing a weekly newspaper in Missoula. He worked as a printer in Butte; returned to Missoula in 1895 to edit the Bitter Root Times during the capital fight; married Mary See in 1896; operated a newspaper in Hamilton briefly; was sergeant at arms in the State legislature during the sixth session when the "war of the copper kings" was at its height.

In 1905, with Tom Stout, later a Montana Congressman, and now the veteran editor of the Billings Gazette, Kelly started the Fergus County Democrat. In 1924, the Lewistown paper was sold, and Kelly purchased the Flathead Monitor in Kalispell.

For two decades, Harry Kelly championed a dam on the Flathead's South Fork. He advocated the multipurpose dam during years when few others gave serious thought to the project, and acquired the nickname "Hungry Horse" Kelly.

Even so Hungry Horse Dam is not a monument to any one single man. Having vital roles in seeing Hungry Horse construction start were such individuals as former Senator B. K. Wheeler, Senator James E. Murray, then Congressman Mike Mansfield, and Congressman Mike Kirwan of Ohio who saw that the project got money. There was the famed Flathead Citizens' Committee sparked by Don Treloar, Al Winkler, and Gray Edmiston, and what an effective organization it was.

The Montana State Press Association meeting last weekend recognized Harry J. Kelly as a longtime weekly publisher—54 years. He was also president of the press association in 1937, and died in 1950.

However, Harry J. Kelly's outstanding contribution to the newspaper field in Montana was his longtime championing of the Hungry Horse project, now an important part of Montana's economic base.

Ten years ago there was effort to name the lake behind Hungry Horse Dam, "Kelly Lake," in honor of the veteran publisher.

We think that such further recognition of "Hungry Horse" Kelly is merited.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2424) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to provide that the equal-time provisions with respect to candidates for public office shall not apply to news and other similar programs. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of the conference report, the time be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided between the majority leader and the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me inquire whether the morning hour has been concluded; or will there later be opportunity for additional matters to be submitted in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has been interrupted by this privileged matter.

Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement which explains in detail the changes which were made in the conference. I, myself, shall make a general explanation of the report, and shall be ready for specific questions, during the course of the presentation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT

Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 now provides that if any radio or television licensee permits any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, such licensee must afford equal opportunities to all other candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station.

When S. 2424 passed the Senate it added a new sentence to section 315(a) of the Communications Act which provided that the appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any newscast, news interview, news documentary, on-the-spot coverage of news events, shall not be deemed to be the use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection.

During the consideration of the bill on the floor of the Senate the following language was added to the exemptions: ", but nothing in this sentence shall be construed as changing the basic intent of Congress with respect to the provisions of this Act, which recognizes that television and radio frequencies are in the public domain, that the license to operate in such frequencies requires operation in the public interest, and that in newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, on-the-spot coverage of news events, all sides of public controversies shall be given as fair an opportunity to be heard as is practically possible."

In addition, the bill as it passed the Senate contained a section 2 declaring the intent of the Congress to examine the amendment at or before the end of a 3-year period immediately following the enactment of the proposed legislation. It also required the Federal Communications Commission to report to Congress annually during such 3-year period certain information which would aid the Congress in its reexamination of the effectiveness and practicability of the amendment being made to section 315.

The House in its action struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill which merely amended section 315(a) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence, as follows:

"Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any bona fide newscast (including news interviews) or on any on-the-spot coverage of news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), where the appearance of the candidate on such newscast, interview, or in connection with such coverage is incidental to the presentation of news, shall not be deemed to be use of broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection."

In conference, S. 2424 was amended by adding to Section 315(a) a new sentence having the same general purpose as the Senate bill when it passed the Senate. However, there are differences which represent compromises between the Senate and House positions on certain points.

Under the House bill an appearance would have been exempted from the equal time requirement only "where the appearance of the candidate on such newscast, interview, or in connection with such coverage is incidental to the presentation of the news."

The Senate bill did not contain language comparable to this and was therefore omitted from the conference substitute except as explained below.

The Senate bill exempted an appearance on a news interview while the House bill exempted such an appearance only when it was included as a part of a bona fide newscast.

In the conference substitute an appearance on a bona fide news interview is exempted without regard to whether it is included as part of a newscast.

It is the intention that in order to be considered bona fide a news interview must be a regularly scheduled program.

It is intended that in order for a news interview to be considered bona fide the content and format thereof, and the participants, must be determined by the licensee in the case of a news interview originating with the licensee of a station and by the network in the case of a news interview originating with a network; and the determination must have been made by the station or network, as the case may be, in the exercise of its bona fide news judgment and not for the political advantage of the candidate for public office.

The Senate bill exempted appearances of candidates on news documentaries. The House amendment made no such exemption. Under the conference substitute, the appearance of a candidate on a news documentary is exempted only if such appearance is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary. Thus, a program which deals predominantly with a candidate would not be a news documentary exempted under provisions of the substitute.

In the conference substitute, in referring to on-the-spot coverage of news events, the expression "bona fide news events" instead of "news events" is used to emphasize the intention to limit the exemptions from the equal time requirement to cases where the appearance of a candidate is not designed to serve the political advantage of that candidate.

The Senate bill, in the sentence being added to section 315(a), contained the following language:

"But nothing in this sentence shall be construed as changing the basic intent of Congress with respect to the provisions of this Act, which recognizes that television and radio frequencies are in the public domain, that the license to operate in such frequencies requires operation in the public interest, and that in newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, on-the-spot coverage of news events, all sides of public controversies shall be given as fair an opportunity to be heard as is practically possible."

With certain modifications, this language has been included in the conference substitute as a sentence reading as follows:

"Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events from the obligation imposed upon them under this Act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

The conferees feel that there is nothing in this language which is inconsistent with the Senate's original language. It is a restatement of the basic policy of the "standard of fairness" which is imposed on broadcasters under the Communications Act of 1934.

SECTION 2

Section 2(a) of the Senate bill declared the intention of Congress to reexamine, on or before the expiration of a 3-year period, the amendment made by the bill to section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, to ascertain whether the amendment had proved to be effective and practicable. Subsection (b) of section 2 required the Federal Communications Commission to report to Congress annually during such 3-year period on the administration of the amendment, together with recommendations. The House amendment contained no similar provisions.

Section 2 of the bill agreed to in conference is similar to these Senate provisions, except that the 3-year limitation has been removed.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I may say that the end product of the conference was the amendment which was agreed to in conference, which reads as follows:

Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any—

(1) bona fide newscast,

(2) bona fide news interview,

(3) bona fide news documentary (if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subject or subjects covered by the news documentary), or

(4) on-the-spot coverage of bona fide events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection. Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield for a question?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator define "news documentary"? I ask this question solely in order that the legislative record may be clear. What is the difference between a news documentary and a television panel show?

Mr. PASTORE. I shall be very glad to provide the answer to the Senator's question.

For instance, only the other day the President of the United States, while in Europe, signed a resolution which permitted the building of a memorial to a former President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Let us assume that at the time when the memorial is completed and is being dedicated—and the dedication ceremonies will constitute a news item of current value—in showing that ceremony or news event, or whatever it might be termed, there is presented a cutback respecting the life of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, leading up to the building of the memorial. In the process of broadcasting that background, it so happens that they show the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama, LISTER HILL, nominating President Franklin Delano Roosevelt for his third term.

At that time, Senator HILL, of Alabama, might have been a candidate for reelection; but his appearance was only incidental to the news documentary regarding the dedication of the memorial, which included the background of the life of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. That is what we mean by a news documentary and the incidental appearance of a candidate on such a program.

Mr. JAVITS. Let me cite a specific situation: When the Senate was debating the civil rights bill in 1957, in the course of the debate, four of us left the Senate Chamber, and went into the Old Supreme Court Chamber, and there broadcast a television show in which, in effect, we repeated the arguments we had been making here on the floor of the Senate. That is what we lawyers call part of the res gestae. At that very moment, the Senate was actually engaged in debate, here on the floor, on the civil rights bill; and a few minutes earlier on that day, the four Senators who participated in that television show had been on the floor of the Senate, and had been participating in the actual debate on that bill. But momentarily we left the floor of the Senate, went to the Old Supreme Court Chamber, and did that television show.

Or individual Senators might leave a conference committee room, and might do a show on the front steps of the Capitol Building.

Would such things constitute news documentaries?

Mr. PASTORE. No; because they would come under the category of a newscast or a news interview of current news.

Mr. JAVITS. That is not what the Senator is thinking about when we exclude panel shows?

Mr. PASTORE. A panel show would be a very different thing. If a panel show had a current, bona fide news value, and was not being used for purposes of advancing the cause of the candidacy of any one particular candidate——

Mr. JAVITS. I understand.

Mr. PASTORE. And if it were on a regularly scheduled program, and if its content and format were exclusively within the jurisdiction or control of the broadcaster or the network, and were done for legitimate, bona fide news reasons, it would be exempted, and would not be a use which the candidate was making of that channel.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

I may say, with deference, that I think this is one of the most important explanations of what is being done that can be made to actually guide the broadcasting companies; and I am very grateful for the explanation.

Mr. PASTORE. In other words, the end product of the conference emphasizes the fact that all of these programs must have a bona fide news value, and must not be used to advance the cause of any particular candidate.

The question is, What is the remedy? What is the remedy for a person who considers himself aggrieved? He files a complaint with the FCC and immediately the FCC will have the responsibility of determining whether the program involving the candidate was bona fide news or that it was such a use as to entitle the opponent to equal time.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island for yielding.

Will he point out in the language of the conference report the language of the law, as amended, or the language of the report itself, where it is clear that panel discussions have to meet the three or four specific conditions to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. PASTORE. Let me interrupt the Senator. I did not say "panel discussions." Panel discussions are not included. A panel discussion is not an exemption as to a use being made under section 315. I am merely talking about a news interview which may have some semblance to a discussion to and fro between individuals who are appearing. But, naturally, the discussion will have to fall within the purview of being a news interview or an on-the-spot news coverage of bona fide news value. There is nothing in the conference version about a panel discussion.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me ask a further question. We specifically struck panel discussions out of the act, as reported by our committee.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. So neither the House version of the bill nor the Senate version of the bill had panel discussions in it.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. But I understood that statements had been made by members of the House committee, and more particularly by the chairman of the House committee, that it was his belief or their belief—and there were several who expressed some opinions on it—that a panel discussion could be considered a news broadcast, and that, therefore, a panel discussion, such as "Face the Nation" or "Meet the Press"——

Mr. PASTORE. Or "Youth Wants To Know"——

Mr. ENGLE. Yes, "Youth Wants To Know" or "Capitol Cloakroom" or "College Press Conference," or any of the others that we know about, and with which we are familiar, might possibly qualify as a news interview, and therefore be permissible.

It seemed to me that, basically, the language of both the Senate version of the bill and the House version of the bill were the same; but the interpretation was different.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. I assert that there should be some clarification, so the matter of interpretation, or legislative intent, as we call it, will be very clear in regard to what we are doing, in order that the FCC will not come up with some silly interpretation—the FCC is perfectly capable of it, as the Senator from Rhode Island well knows.

Mr. PASTORE. I understand specifically and precisely the point the Senator from California desires to make.

Let me say that we assumed, during the floor debate on the Senate version of the bill, that such shows as those which have been mentioned by the distinguished Senator from California would be included under "panel discussions"; and at that time he submitted an amendment which, of course, deleted that from the bill.

It so happens that that kind of show had been interpreted by the House of Representatives group, and even in the debate on the House version of the bill, as falling within the category of a news interview. That brought about debate in the conference.

In order to bring about the guarantees to which the Senator from California refers so eloquently, we inserted certain language which makes that quite clear that we are requiring news interviews to be bona fide. The words "bona fide" were not included when the bill went to conference.

We have spelled out in the House report itself precisely what we mean by bona fide news interview. It is provided, specifically, first of all, that it shall be a regularly scheduled program. Secondly, the content and format must be exclusively under the jurisdiction of the broadcaster or of the network. Furthermore, we have said, in specific language, that that kind of program must not be done for the purpose of advancing the cause of any candidate as against another.

I do not see how the language can be written any more specifically than that. I realize there are areas where there might be chances of abuse, but I think the licensee or network would find it pretty difficult to get away with it.

Furthermore, we have written a second section in the bill, which was, again, the Senate version, to the effect that we intend to watch this matter very closely. We intend to supervise this matter very carefully, and we are asking the Commission to submit reports with regard to the administration of this amendment.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. Let me say to my distinguished friend that I am sure he has tried very hard to do a good job with reference to this proposed legislation. I know that he understands the problem. He and his associates on the conference did their very best to work it out. But I would be less than frank if I did not say that I have a deep sense of concern about this proposed legislation. My concern about this measure grows out of my political experience, which has been a very unhappy experience with reference to the kind of treatment that Democratic candidates get from the newspapers of this country.

Mr. PASTORE. I understand that completely.

Mr. ENGLE. And I would not want to see the broadcasting industry of this Nation, television and radio, ever to be in a position to give us the kind of "business" we get from the newspapers of the Nation. Getting on the air is a privilege, and we ought to insist that the treatment on our airways be fair. That is the last refuge some of us have so far as our electability is concerned. This bill goes to the jugular vein of Democrats who run for office.

My concern with the language of this proposed legislation is that it puts the exercise of discretion in the hands of the broadcasters. I do not like that. I would have preferred to see the bill written in such a way that conditions outside of the control of the broadcaster had a definite bearing as to who could be selected. For instance, if it is required that only newscasts can go on the air, and it has to be a newscast of current interest, then the fact of the freshness of the news itself is a controlling factor.

Mr. PASTORE. If the Senator——

Mr. ENGLE. Please let me proceed.

Mr. PASTORE. Very well.

Mr. ENGLE. Then it is not a matter of complete discretion. That was my concern with the provision for news documentary. We had the news documentary provision included in our bill. I was unhappy about that, but I was so glad to get the provision relating to panels out of the bill that I did not want to go any further with reference to news documentary.

The reason I was fearful about the provision for panels is that I know how they can be rigged up. I do not want a situation to exist in which panels can be rigged up.

I had no objection, incidentally, to the programs "Meet the Press" and "Face the Nation," which are nationwide affairs, because, in the very circumstances of the case, there are only a few men of national prominence who would appear on those programs from either side of the political fence. Those broadcasts could be carefully monitored. But what I was afraid of was the point the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] mentioned when he discussed the matter, namely, panel discussions at the local level. That is where a panel discussion can be manipulated, because conditions outside of the conscience of the broadcaster itself can no longer be a controlling factor.

So although I am not going to oppose this conference report, Mr. President, I want to make it very plain that I have a deep concern about the freedom and the complete fairness of what I regard as the most important and vital political media in the world today, namely, television and radio. And I want to see them fairly handled.

I wish to serve notice on this Senate floor that I propose to watch the administration of this act with great care, because I regard it as a matter of vital importance to the political situation in America that we have complete fairness, equality of treatment, and objective handling of the news and political candidates during periods of election.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ENGLE. I thank my distinguished friend from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield me 5 minutes of his time?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. In just a minute. I merely want to answer the distinguished Senator from California, and assure him it would have done no violence to the sensitivities of the junior Senator from Rhode Island if provision for panel discussions or "Meet the Press" type of broadcasts had been deleted from the bill itself. The House was adamant in its position of what it interpreted as permissible under the interpretation of a bona fide news interview. We had some conferees on our side of the conference who felt likewise.

Realizing that there was a conflict, and that we could not agree unanimously on some of the matters, then it became the responsibility of the Senate conferees to yield, but to insist on inserting in the bill certain safeguards, in order to give us as near perfect protection as was possible under the circumstances. I admit it may not be perfect, but I also submit it comes as near to being perfect as we could accomplish under the circumstances.

I wanted to call this matter to the attention of the Senator from California, because, while the House conferees found some fault with the so-called Proxmire amendment, we insisted it be retained in the bill, if with some slight modifications, because it was the one condition we could write into the law to make sure the Federal Communications Commission would give the matter the right interpretation.

Let me read what the chairman of the House committee had to say, even after they resisted the Proxmire amendment, but finally came around, receded, and concurred in the amendment. He said:

> Now, just in case anybody in the broadcasting industry or in the Federal Communications Commission, or even a candidate himself, should get the idea that "The reins are off; you can do what you want to," we have accepted in the conference substitute a provision similar to what was referred to as the Proxmire amendment in the other body. This provision says that nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving the broadcasters in connection with the presentation of news, news interviews, documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events from the obligation imposed upon them under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

We insisted that that provision remain in the bill, to be a continuing reminder and admonition to the Federal Communications Commission and to the broadcasters alike, that we were not abandoning the philosophy that gave birth to section 315, in giving the people the right to have a full and complete disclosure of conflicting views on news of interest to the people of the country.

I thought I should emphasize that.

Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I shall not oppose, but will support, the conference report; but I join the Senator from California in his concern about one feature of it, that apparently, under the term "bona fide news interview," it includes certain kinds of panel discussions.

I find what seems to me to be the clearest explanation of what was intended by the exemption of bona fide news interviews on page 17782 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for yesterday, in a statement by the distinguished Representative from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], the chairman of the House legislative committee which deals with this subject, which reads as follows:

> Under the substitute agreed to in conference, the appearance of a candidate on a newscast or news interview will not be exempt from the equal time requirement, unless the newscast or news interview is bona fide, and appearance of a candidate in on-the-spot coverage of news events is not to be exempt from the equal time requirement unless the program covers bona fide news events.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island if he joins in that expression?

Mr. PASTORE. Absolutely. As I said before, the crux of the provision rests upon the interpretation of bona fide newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries or on-the-spot coverage of special news events. The words "bona fide" were deliberately put in to give specific guidance to the Federal Communications Commission, so that the moment a station deviated from what was a bona fide newscast in showing a candidate for public office, that would be a use which was not exempt. It is not exempt unless it is bona fide.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. It seems to the Senator from Florida that there are two important terms in the statement by Mr. HARRIS, which is now subscribed to by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. The firm term is "bona fide" and the second is "news events."

In the opinion of the Senator from Florida the words "news events" would necessarily have reference to current events of news importance. Is that the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. In other words, if in the panel discussion it was the intent or the objective of the panelists, in the course which was followed, to go back into the prior record of the person appearing on the news panel, to bring out controversial facts about that record, then such a panel discussion would not come within the exemption; is that correct?

Mr. PASTORE. Let me put it this way: If the junior Senator from Rhode Island appeared on "Meet the Press," and, when asked questions, all he talked about was his previous record and how good a Senator he had been, I would say that would not be an exempt appearance under the law, if the Senator were a candidate at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time of the Senator from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield me 5 minutes more?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President we have only 10 minutes remaining on our side. We will yield 3 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be an extension of the time limitation of 10 minutes, with 5 minutes to be granted to each side.

Mr. SCOTT. I join in that request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PASTORE. I yield further to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Rhode Island has gone far to clear up the point I have raised. There is one additional step about which I should like to question the Senator.

I am not so much concerned regarding the actions of the person who is being interviewed as I am concerned regarding the actions of certain stations and certain panelists, in their desire to turn the interview into a political effort, by themselves going into the question of the background of the person being interviewed, as to prior actions of his in the field of politics or in public life. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island that, in the event the panelists resorted to those tactics, the panel discussion would then not be exempt from the equal-time provisions of the law?

Mr. PASTORE. All during the time in the conference the junior Senator from Rhode Island lived with a consciousness of the apprehension held on the part of the distinguished Senator from Florida and on the part of the distinguished Senator from California. I never forgot it for one minute. I knew exactly what the Senators had in mind as to some of the abuses, about which they talked to me privately and publicly, and during the course of the debate.

We have sought to put in the proper safeguards. It is not a riveted case completely, to the extent that there cannot be an abuse here and there, but the fact of the matter is that it would be necessary to go pretty far afield to get into any abuse which would do any damage or harm to a candidate, be he a Republican, a Democrat, or an independent.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. I hope he will forgive me for being a bit specific about the question. In certain panel discussions, which I discussed with the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, which took place in my own senatorial race last year, an emphasis was laid not upon the then presently-held attitudes of the candidate who happened to be interviewed, but instead upon actions which had transpired years before. It so happened that both the Senator from Florida and his distinguished opponent had had long-time experience in public affairs.

Mr. PASTORE. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida had no objection to that whatsoever, so long as equal opportunity was given to both candidates. In that event, there could be no objection.

The question I am now addressing to the Senator, who is my distinguished friend, is this: In the event such a panel discussion is held with one candidate before the panel, do I correctly understand that if an effort were made, either friendly or unfriendly—it would make no difference—to go back into former activities and former positions in the public life or political life of the person being interviewed, it is the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island that that action would transcend the exemption and make the panel discussion come under the equal-time provision of the law?

Mr. PASTORE. I will say "yes," because that would get into the field of using the program for the promotion of or the advancement of the cause of a particular candidate.

I wish to say to all the Members of the Senate that section 315 was written in the law not to promote any one candidate nor for the benefit of one candidate as against another, or for candidates themselves generally, but was written into the law to give the public the advantage of a full, complete and exhaustive discussion, on a fair opportunity basis, to all legally qualified candidates but for the benefit of the public at large.

The minute one invokes a subterfuge, one is not operating in the public interest and is violating the spirit of section 315, which would exclude him from the exception we have made thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time granted to the Senator from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield for an additional statement?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the distinguished Senator made it clear that in order to come under the exemption classification a panel discussion must not only be a regularly scheduled one in the format under the control of the station—and all the other provisions recited in the conference report and in the act must be met—but also it must relate to current news events. Provided it is so limited, the Senator from Florida sees no great objection to it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator, in the explanation of the report, I believe, referred to bona fide candidates.

Mr. PASTORE. No; I referred to bona fide news.

Mr. GOLDWATER. At the outset of his explanation I think the Senator referred to bona fide candidates.

Mr. PASTORE. If I did, I did not mean to. I do not think I did. I think I referred to bona fide news. I think I read it. It says:

> It has to be a bona fide newscast; a bona fide news interview; a bona fide news documentary.

The only thing in the law in that regard is that one has to be a legally qualified candidate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me ask the Senator a question on that point. A month or so ago one of our colleagues was denied time on the radio because equal time might be asked for by other candidates. This man is not a legally qualified candidate for the office to which reference was made.

Is there protection for people who might be considered to be candidates, but who are not legally qualified candidates?

Mr. PASTORE. It is not the case that there are protected people. I think the CBS made a strained interpretation of the law in that instance. What the motive was I do not know. I do not question the sincerity of the motive, but I say CBS was supercautious in considering that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] was a candidate for any particular office. No announcement had been made. Therefore the Senator was not a legally qualified candidate under section 315. In my opinion CBS was probably gun shy because of the so-called Lar Daly decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. PASTORE. Will the Senator yield me 1 additional minute?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. The network took superlative precautions to see that it was not in violation of the law. I think such a case only serves the purpose of pointing out, really, how ridiculous was the so-called Lar Daly decision. As a lawyer, I question whether the interpretation was legally correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I support the conference report. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island for his presentation on the general subject of freedom of the press and the first amendment.

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SCOTT. On the general subject of freedom of the press and the first amendment, the freedom of newspapers, magazines, and other media of communication except radio and television has been pretty well established over the years. I am very much concerned that in this limited area of the airwaves if we in Congress attempt to restrict too closely the freedom of the press, which already is more limited in that area than in any other of the media generally understood to be areas of communication, in my judgment, the time will come when the Supreme Court will strike down whatever we have done in an attempt to bail out the Federal Communications Commission for some future unfortunate decision. Therefore I think we ought to be exceptionally careful to provide as much freedom of expression on radio and television as we possibly can.

If the decision were left to me alone, as I have said before and as I say again, I should repeal section 315 entirely, but that is a minority point of view, and it arises entirely from my respect for the right of the people to be absolutely free in the expression of their point of view, subject only to the protection of the criminal and the civil statutes against misuse and abuse of privileges.

On this measure I believe, as the Senator from Rhode Island said at one time during the conference, that we have come back with a bill which is better than either the Senate version or the House version. We have maintained very carefully the spirit of the Proxmire amendment, and I ought to point out what I do not think has yet been explained, that the phrase "To afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance" does not refer merely to political discussions as such or to opposing views of political parties or of candidates. It is intended to encompass all legitimate areas of public importance which are controversial, and there are many, as we know, which pertain to medicine, to education, and to other areas than political discussion, and it is intended that no one point of view shall gain control over the airwaves to the exclusion of another legitimate point of view.

As to the comment with regard to bona fide news interviews, we were all of the opinion that we should make it perfectly clear, not only as contemplated in the Proxmire amendment, that the restriction of the obligation of fairness and of the protection of rights of all persons legitimately entitled to be heard remains in the law, but that "bona fide" as applied to each separate type of matter treated, be it newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, or on-the-spot coverage, means that there shall not be any device or evasion to give an unfair advantage to any person.

As to panel shows, there was no objection to "Meet the Press." There was no objection to "Youth Wants To Know," or "College Press Conference," or "Face the Nation," or anything of that sort. There was a legitimate fear that in some local areas there would be rigged news interviews for the benefit of one candidate or another.

It was not the feeling that panel shows should be ruled out, that panel shows should be denied the right to secure public figures who might incidentally be candidates for public office, but to make sure that in hearing such public figures it was not merely a device to advance their candidacy for office rather than to advance the exposition of different points of view as to news.

We looked up the definition of "news," Mr. President, and one of the definitions of "news" is, "of current interest." This is a very broad definition, and therefore there remains the necessity, in our opinion, for the protection of the public by retaining supervision over the operation of this new addition to the act. This is done I think very wisely in section 2, where Congress declares its intentions to reexamine these provisions of the act—that is, 315(a) and its amendment—and that in assisting Congress in its reexamination, the FCC shall make an annual report setting forth the information and data used by it in determining questions arising from it, connected with such amendment, and, second, such recommendations as it deems necessary in the public interest.

In other words, this amendment is designed to establish for future reference certain criteria as to equal time and a fair discussion of controversy. At all times the respective committees of the Senate and the House will not only retain supervision, because there is no time limit in this amendment, but will also retain or are entitled to insist upon the right to be kept informed. I believe that we have not in any sense dangerously or critically expanded the law. On the contrary, I think we have expanded the freedom of individuals and the freedom of this particular medium as contemplated in the first amendment to the Constitution.

I again say that the conferees were devoted, were very careful to consider all of the many aspects involved in this amendment, and I believe that they have come back with a conference report which deserves favorable consideration.

I shall be glad to yield a minute to my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank my colleague from Pennsylvania for his courtesy.

Mr. President, I wish merely to second everything he has said and everything that is stated in the conference report.

This is a matter to which the conferees, as had the Senate committee, have given the most careful thought, a matter the difficulties of which the conferees and the members of the committee thoroughly recognized. We believe we have steered a proper course between excesses on the one side and on the other. If history or experience proves that we are wrong, the law can be changed, this plus the fact referred to already that the stations hold their licenses subject to reconsideration upon their expiration, and when applications for renewal are before the Commission.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say, if I may interrupt, that networks also own stations, and therefore we have an indirect control over them.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. All these considerations compel us to think that such risks as may be involved are risks which should be taken.

I wish to compliment, if I may, the chairman of the subcommittee, the chairman of the conferees, for the extraordinary skill with which he guided the deliberations of the conference. He had a bunch of wild horses on his hands, and he handled them with a very stern but understanding rein. The same is true of my colleagues in the conference on both sides. It was a pleasure to serve with them.

Mr. PASTORE. I should like to have that same bunch of wild horses on every conference I attend. I am deeply indebted to every one of them for the consideration and cooperation I received.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to say that all of us were filled with admiration at the way in which the chairman of the conference handled a situation which required a combination of tact and firmness and a background of considerable experience. We are most grateful to him. I should always be happy to serve on any conference of which he is the chairman.

If there are no other requests for time, I will yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

STATE TAXATION OF INCOME DERIVED FROM INTERSTATE COMMERCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2524) relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and establishing a Commission on State Taxation of Interstate Commerce and Interstate and Intergovernmental Taxation Problems. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of September 2, 1959, p. 17770, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object——

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator misunderstands the situation. No request has been made. I was advised by the acting majority leader that an attempt was to be made at this time, with the knowledge and consent of the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from New Hampshire, to limit the time for discussion of the conference report.

Mr. KUCHEL. All I am doing is reserving the right to object to the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—there are Senators on both sides of the aisle who opposed this proposed legislation when it was first before the Senate, and who, I am sure, will oppose it now. I personally shall oppose it. I believe that adequate time should be allowed for the consideration and discussion of what apparently is a very important measure. The absence of a quorum should be suggested in order that Senators who desire to debate the report may have an opportunity to come into the Chamber. I have no objection to consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do I correctly understand that the conference report is now the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I to understand that the Senator from California feels that a quorum call should be made?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do.

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask the distinguished Senator from California whether he thinks it would be more appropriate to enter a unanimous consent order for the limitation of time before the quorum call, or after.

Mr. KUCHEL. I suggest that the request for a unanimous-consent agreement be made subsequent to the quorum call, when the ranking minority member of the Finance Committee, who is interested in the legislation, will be in the Chamber. There will be no trouble.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield for that purpose, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to take about 5 minutes for the transaction of morning business, but I do not wish to interrupt my distinguished colleague——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] has the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may propound a unanimous-consent request for the limitation of time?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand that a limitation of 30 minutes to a side is agreeable. With that understanding, I make the request at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do not wish to have the time consumed by other business and matters in the morning hour. I wish to make sure that the full amount of time will be available for the discussion of the conference report.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I did not mean to intrude morning business into this discussion. I thought there was a period of waiting in connection with a quorum call. I wish a little time, but solely to discuss the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I renew my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that time be limited to 30 minutes to a side.

Mr. KUCHEL. To be controlled by the chairman of the committee and the acting minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, title I of the Senate bill granted immunity to an out-of-State company only if the business activities of the out-of-State company within the State were limited to specific activities described under that title. These activities were, first, the solicitation of orders by such person or his representative for sales of tangible personal property; and second, sales, or the solicitation of orders for sales, of tangible personal property on behalf of the out-of-State company by one or more independent contractors.

The conferees agreed to title I of the Senate bill with certain minor clarifying amendments. On page 2, lines 11 to 13, there was some duplication and uncertainty as to the use of the word "client" as well as "customer." Since the word "client" was fully covered under the concept of the word "customer," it was eliminated as unnecessary from the bill. On page 3, line 4, a clarifying amendment was added to make it clear that the maintenance of an office by one or more independent contractors whose activities in behalf of the out-of-State company consisted only of making sales or soliciting orders for sales of tangible personal property would not remove the immunity otherwise provided in the bill for the out-of-State company. The independent contractor would, of course, not have such an immunity in the State in which he was operating.

Title II of the Senate bill which provided for an independent commission for the study of State taxation problems was eliminated by the conferees. Instead of such a commission, the conferees agreed that a study should be made by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate of State taxation of income derived from interstate commerce and should report to the Congress the results of this study together with proposals for legislation by July 1, 1962. In making this study, the committees could act either separately or jointly, or both, or through duly authorized subcommittees.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. It seems to me that the conferees have come forth with an even more satisfactory measure than the one which passed the Senate. I commend the chairman and the members of the conference for the fine job they have done.

When the so-called Commission amendment was offered by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] I supported it, but I felt even at the time that it would be more appropriate for this study to be made by committees of Congress charged with preparing legislation.

I had, in fact, prepared an amendment very much along these lines, although not limited to these two committees, because it was my feeling at the time that it was preferable to have the study made directly by the committees rather than by an outside commission. Therefore, I shall support the conference report, and shall do so wholeheartedly. I believe that very constructive work has been done by the Senator's distinguished committee. This new law will be of great benefit particularly to small businesses since otherwise the presence of their salesmen in other States would subject them to the jeopardy of multiple taxation which, due to the methods of taxation in the various States, sometimes would be based on more than 100 percent of income. I am very grateful to the distinguished Senator and the other members of his committee for the fine work they have done.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, in order that my remarks may not come out of the time of the Senator from Virginia, may I ask the distinguished Senator from California if he will yield me 3 minutes at this time?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator from California. First, I say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that I admire greatly the way in which the bill was handled and the way in which it was carefully prepared and every detail scrutinized. I believe that so far as the bill itself is concerned, it is a good bill.

I regret that the House members of the committee of conference limited the scope of the study which is provided for in section 2 of the bill. I was much interested to hear the words of commendation from the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] about the conference report.

This is, of course, a bill for the just protection of certain out-of-State, nonresident corporations from State income taxes. Yet individual's incomes are being taxed by States in which they do not reside and they are offered no relief in this bill Another bill involving this subject probably will be brought up on the floor of the Senate soon. At that time I shall have a good deal to say. I merely say now that I had hoped, while we were studying the question of the overlapping of taxation, we would realize that an individual certainly is entitled to as much consideration as a corporation.

In view of the growing tendency on the part of the larger, metropolitan States of the Union to reach into some of the smaller States or borderline States and tax their citizens, I had hoped that an objective, careful study of the whole question of overlapping taxation and nonresident taxation could be made by the committee. But that has been eliminated from the conference report. Because it has been cut out of the report, and because I feel the principle is so vital, I shall be compelled to vote against the conference report, even though I admire the bill and admire greatly the work of the committee in producing it.

I merely ask the distinguished chairman two questions: First, under the conference report, is it correct that the joint committee is precluded from considering the general question of overlapping taxation. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct about that. The study will not cover that question. The matter was thoroughly discussed by the conferees, and the House was adamant in the position that this particular study should relate only to the income taxation of interstate commerce. I think all of us recognize the fact that there is a great problem to be met in the question of overlapping taxation between the States and the Federal Government. I think what should be done is to have a commission appointed for that purpose. But the House would not agree to extend the study to include broader taxation, overlapping and otherwise, as between the States. This study is to relate only to the question of interstate taxation of tangible personal property by means of a net income tax or a tax measured by net income.

Mr. COTTON. I greatly appreciate the comments of the chairman. I sincerely hope that it will be possible to have the Commission conduct such a broad study. I know the Senate conferees did all they could to hold within the purview of the study these aspects of the question which I believe ought to be considered. I can understand the very obvious delight with which Senators from the larger States, such as New York and Massachusetts, greet the limitation, because I represent a victim State. I commend the members of the committee of conference for their efforts, although I regret that I cannot vote for the conference report. I still think it is regrettable that such action had to be taken, because the bill is an excellent bill.

I thank the distinguished chairman of the committee for his consideration.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I concur in the statement made by the distinguished chairman of the committee. I assure the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] that despite the fact that the committee of conference did not include an overall study of all the tax problems as they affect the States and the Federal Government, the matter was considered, and we did everything we could as a committee of conference to retain that section.

Although I regret that the Senator from New Hampshire feels compelled to vote against the report, I hope that the situation may be corrected in studies which we all expect and hope will be made of this problem in the future.

I may say to the chairman that I have heard concern expressed by some citizens with respect to the taxation of corporations or businesses which obtain business by agents outside the State. I call attention to one statement in the conference report which I think should be reassuring. It reads:

> The conferees have inserted a clarifying amendment to this provision of the Senate bill, to assure that the maintenance of an office by such an independent contractor within the State shall not subject the out-of-State business to income taxation.

I inquire of the chairman if it is not his understanding that this provision would at least protect those persons who take orders in States.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is my understanding.

Mr. CARLSON. I appreciate the Senator's statement, because there is some concern about this matter.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I am glad the Senator from Kansas raised that point, so that it will be clear in the RECORD what the intent of the Senate amendment was as agreed to in conference. I quote the following from the Senate Finance Commitee report:

> The immunity otherwise available to an out-of-State company under subsection (a) of section 1 is not lost merely by reason of the fact that an independent contractor soliciting and accepting orders on its behalf for sales of tangible personal property maintains an office in the State, the primary purpose and use of which is other than to serve representatives of the out-of-State company who are engaged in the solicitation of orders of the nature described in paragraphs (1) or (2) of subsection (a), or both, since the maintenance of an office by an independent contractor is not the maintenance of an office by such out-of-State company or by its "representative." (Under subsection (d)(2) of section 1, the term "representative" does not include an "independent contractor.")

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I should like to ask the able Senator from Virginia if the conference report would prevent a State from levying a tax on a business, in the following example: Assume that the XYZ company of New Jersey sends a salesman into Virginia looking for purchasers of any tangible personal property which the company in New Jersey is manufacturing. Is it the intention of the conference report to prevent the State of Virginia from levying any tax on the business which is done in Virginia between the Virginians and the representatives of the New Jersey company?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. It is the intention of the bill to grant immunity to the out-of-State company where the salesmen only solicit orders within the State. In other words, the report prohibits the taxation of the out-of-State company with respect to orders which are solicited within the State, but which are subject to be concluded at the place of the company outside the State. If the company has facilities in another State, such as warehouses, there is no immunity granted by this bill, and the question of taxation is left to the courts or future action by the Congress.

Mr. KUCHEL. I should like to ask another question: Has the Treasury Department made any comment in regard to this proposed legislation?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Treasury Department has not made a comment on this particular proposed legislation. I believe it wrote a letter to the committee, some time ago, and said it believed the problem should have further study. The Treasury has never taken a position of opposition with regard to this particular measure.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield for some clarifying questions in regard to what the committee has done?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. First, just now the Senator from Virginia used the word "title." I emphasize its legal nature. It means that the ownership of the merchandise will not pass to the buyer in the State of Virginia. But I do not think the Senator from Virginia meant that. I think what he is talking about is that the acceptance of the order will not take place in the State of Virginia. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I meant to say if an order is solicited, for example, in California, but if the headquarters are in Virginia, the contract must be concluded in Virginia, not in California.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the Senator from Virginia using the word "title" in the sense of the acceptance of the order or in the sense of the acceptance of the merchandise?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Is the Senator from New York speaking of the contract?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes. I understand this measure relates only to the acceptance of the order, rather than to passage of title to the goods that are ordered.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it the theory of this measure that it is a bracket—in other words, that, on the one hand, it prevents taxation when there is just ordertaking, without order acceptance; and, on the other hand, taxation is permitted when there is a corporation, incorporated under the laws of a State, or an individual who is domiciled in that State, and that, in between, the various questions or the range of questions are still left to court adjudication, as in the present way?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator from New York is correct, as to the immunity granted in the bill, the bill does not give the States any power to levy taxes.

Mr. JAVITS. Is that the theory of this proposed legislation?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think that is very good; and I compliment the committee. The chairman has done many fine things, and I think this is an excellent example of his work and leadership in resolving these difficult questions, and especially for facilitating small business.

Subsection (c) deals with independent contractors. Is it the intent of this measure that the standards which must be observed by independent contractors are the same as those which must be observed by a company operating directly—in other words, that an independent contractor, too, must have his orders accepted outside the State in which the orders are taken?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. No; he can conclude the contract in the State.

Mr. JAVITS. I see. That is very important. It was not completely clear.

In short, therefore, the rule for the independent contractor is different from the rule for the direct contractor, because he is a resident of that State and may accept within that State.

Therefore, the word "sales," in subsection (c), is a word of art in connection with that point; is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I think a word of explanation should be stated.

The report states that it was the purpose of both Houses specifically to exempt from State taxation, income derived from interstate commerce, where the only business activity within the State by the out-of-State company was the solicitation. I think that should clarify that point.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield further to me?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I correctly understand that the conference report in no way forbids State taxation of income from sales of tangible personal property in interstate commerce, where there is a sales office in the State?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is correct. The office provision was stricken out of the Senate version of the bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes.

Likewise, nothing is attempted to be done by the conference report to prevent a State from taxing any interstate business activities except the sale of tangible personal property; is that correct?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That is correct. The bill deals with the Supreme Court decision relating to the net income taxation of income derived from the sale of tangible personal property.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, at this time I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, this is an extremely difficult tax bill. It appears that the base of the conference report is considerably narrowed from legislation as it was originally introduced in the Senate earlier this year.

Nevertheless, some of the States of the United States have for many years had laws taxing out-of-State companies doing business within their borders, and measured the tax, under a formula, on the basis of the business done within their borders.

I have received communications from the taxing authorities of the State government of California. My State is one commonwealth which has had a tax on out-of-State corporations, measured by the amount of business done within my State.

What is wrong with requiring an out-of-State corporation doing business in any one of our States to pay exactly the same proportionate tax as that exacted from a business which is located within that very State? Why deny to State governments a part of their tax base? Why treat an out-of-State business differently from a local business to the extent they both do business within the State?

It seems to me the Congress should reject this kind of proposed legislation which we have before us today.

The executive officer of the Franchise Tax Board of California has prepared a paper on this subject; and I ask unanimous consent that the paper, by Mr. John J. Campbell, of California, be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REACTION IN CALIFORNIA TO DECISIONS IN NORTHWESTERN CEMENT AND STOCKHAM CASES

(By John J. Campbell)

In what was termed by Justice Felix Frankfurter as breaking "new ground," the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Northwestern States Portland Cement Company v. Minnesota[1] and Williams v. Stockham Valves and Fittings, Inc. that the net income from interstate operations of a foreign corporation engaged exclusively in interstate commerce may be subject to State income taxation provided the levy is not discriminatory and is properly apportioned to local activities within the State.

It is the opinion of a number of tax authorities that this is something new in State taxation. However, Minnesota has had such a law on its books since 1933[2] and California has actually been taxing such corporations since 1937.[3] Only one corporation has been seen fit to contest the California tax and it was soundly turned down by the California Supreme Court in West Publishing Company v. McColgan[4] and by the U.S. Supreme Court in a summary decision in 1946.[5]

It does not appear to be generally accepted that the West Publishing Co. case involved the taxation of a foreign corporation engaged exclusively in interstate commerce and the dissenting opinion in the Stockham Valves and Fittings, Inc., and Northwestern States Portland Cement Company cases suggests that the Publishing Company case did not involve interstate commerce exclusively but that the activities of the company in California were "the usual criteria" which the court has consistently held to constitute the doing of intrastate commerce.

However, the difference in fact between the two cases is so minute as to defy reasonable distinction and a reading of the West Publishing Co. decision of the California Supreme Court upholding the tax leaves no doubt that the California tax was intended to be and was imposed on corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce.

Since 1929, domestic and foreign corporations doing business in California have been taxed under the bank and corporation tax law[6] on the right or privilege to do business in the State. The tax extends to all foreign corporations doing intrastate business in California and is measured by income earned in the State, including income from both intrastate and interstate commerce.

If, as indicated by the dissenting opinion in the Stockham Valves and Fittings, Inc., case, the West Publishing Co. had been engaged in intrastate activities, the corporation could have been taxed under the existing law and there would have been no need for a new law. However, it was not taxed under the franchise tax law but under a new law applicable to corporations (and others) engaged exclusively in interstate commerce. In 1937, the California State Legislature recognized the need for such a law to put corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce in parity with other corporations engaged in intrastate activities or both intrastate and interstate activities.

The new law, the Corporation Income Tax Act,[7] was intended to be supplementary to the franchise tax law. Although a separate statute, most of its provisions were the same as the franchise tax law. With one minor exception, computation of income was identical and the apportionment of income to the State the same. Corporations taxed under one law were not taxed under the other and taxes erroneously paid under one act could be offset against taxes due under the other law. In 1951, the two laws were consolidated under the bank and corporation tax law.[8] The distinction between corporations doing intrastate and interstate business in the State and those engaged exclusively in interstate business was retained. However, the consolidation of the two laws eliminated many duplicating provisions.

In apportioning income to the State, California uses the three factors—property, payroll, and sales. Sales are allotted to the State where the sales are solicited by the employees of the corporation. Thus, if the corporation has no property or employees in California, the corporation is not subject ot tax on income from business activities under either law.[9] Sales by foreign corporations which ship their products to customers in California on orders solicited by mail-order catalogs, advertisements in magazines, radio and television programs, and those solicited by means of telephone communications are not considered to be California sales, and if the corporation has no other activities here it is not subject to tax. Use of the solicitation theory in allocating sales as contrasted to the destination theory avoids jurisdictional problems in apportioning income of a foreign corporation to the State where no jurisdiction may exist to tax the corporation.

Corporations reporting under the corporation income-tax provisions totaled 1,265 in 1957, as compared with 74,260 reporting under the franchise-tax provisions of the law. Corporation income-tax collections totaled $953,711 for 1957, as compared to $163,870,435 collected under the franchise-tax provisions.[10] While collections under the income-tax provisions may seem small by comparison, nevertheless, over one-half of the tax collected under these provisions is paid by less than 50 corporations. Thus, these 50 corporations pay an annual average tax of approximately $10,000 each. Also, it is known that a number of corporations which are on the borderline status between exclusively interstate and in part intrastate tax activities do file and pay their tax under the franchise-tax provisions.

Fear that many corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce may be overburdened with new State tax levies on the basis of the principal decision may not materialize. As is shown by California's figures, the number of corporations subject to tax under the income tax provisions is exceedingly small and the amount of taxes collected less than 1 percent of those collected under the franchise tax law. Also, since the tax is deductible for Federal tax purposes, the additional tax burden which may be imposed by the States which adopt such levies will be relatively light. Overbalancing the additional tax burden, is the economic effect on other corporations which, because of their more extensive operations, are required to include in the measure of their tax income earned from interstate operations. Corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce receive the same benefits and impose similar burdens on State and local governments as do corporations engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce. The effect of the decision making corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce pay their way places the tax burden more equitably where it belongs—on all the corporations which benefit from services performed by the State and local governments.

Likewise, whatever extra bookkeeping that may be required by new State laws does not appear excessive. Corporations are required to maintain income accounts for Federal tax purposes. Additional records that may be required relate primarily to apportionment of income. States using the three-factor formula of property, payroll, and sales will not require extensive new records on the part of the corporations. Property and payroll records are maintained by most corporations. Computation of the sales factor may require some additional records; however, the corporations reporting under the California income tax law have not found the keeping of such records an excessive burden.

Foreign corporations owning property in a State other than that in which they are incorporated or maintain their principal place of business are required to pay property taxes on that property despite the fact that the property might be used exclusively in interstate commerce. The levy of a State tax upon the income from such property is not a material extension of the property taxation principle. It merely imposes on the corporation a tax which the State is empowered to levy on its own residents and upon nonresident individuals. Likewise, if the property had been owned by a foreign corporation doing intrastate business in the State, the income could be included in the measure of an excise or privilege tax. Subjecting a foreign corporation to a tax on the income from such property removes an exemption not otherwise granted to citizens and nonresident individuals similarly situated.

Individuals who derive income from their labors are taxed by most States on income earned therein, irrespective of residence. Their incomes are subject to taxation irrespective of whether they are employed on projects which are exclusively interstate, intrastate, or both combined. Corporations similarly derive income primarily from the aggregate labor of many employees. Neither moral nor economic reasons justify an exemption of such income from State taxation merely because it may have been earned exclusive in interstate commerce.

Fears that a corporation may be subject to an income tax levy merely because it sells to customers in the taxing State by means of magazine advertisements, radio and television programs or telephone communications are not justified. It is assumed that in the situation referred to, the corporation has neither property nor employees in the taxing State and that deliveries of the corporation's products are made through the mail or by means of a common carrier. If a State levy imposed on such a basis should escape the scythe of the commerce clause, nevertheless it would run the risk of being invalidated under the due process clause. Jurisdiction is a prime requisite for taxation. It is very questionable that a tax could be imposed on a foreign corporation solely on the basis that it shipped its products by mail or common carrier to customers in the taxing State.

The argument that the Stockham decision might permit the multiple taxation of a corporation's income derived exclusively from interstate commerce by two or more States is not new. The same argument has frequently been made with respect to privilege type taxes. Yet, the court's opinion in the Stockham case seems to preclude any possibility of multiple taxation of the same income. The requirement that the tax be "not discriminatory and properly apportioned to local activities within the taxing State" would prevent any State from taxing more than its fair share of income earned exclusively in interstate commerce. The same limitations as to nondiscriminatory and fairly apportioned taxes have long been applied to the privilege type taxes measured by income from both intrastate and interstate commerce.

While the Supreme Court expressed a "need for clearing up the tangled underbrush of past cases," nevertheless, the Court's decisions in the field of taxation relating to interstate commerce have been fairly consistent. Not only has this consistency been retained in income taxes imposed on corporations but in property taxes, gross receipts taxes, sales and use taxes and employment taxes.

It has long been settled that foreign corporations doing intrastate business in the taxing State may be taxed under a privilege type tax measured by income, including income from both intrastate and interstate commerce, provided the tax is fairly apportioned to tax only income earned from activities in the State.[11] However, the Court has consistently refused to extend the privilege type taxes to corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce. The most recent case on this subject is Spector Motor Services, Inc. v. O'Connor,[12] where the Court invalidated a Connecticut privilege type tax imposed on a foreign corporation whose activities within the State were confined exclusively to interstate transportation. The most significant feature of the case is that three dissenting judges voted to uphold the tax on the ground that the difference between a privilege type tax measured by income and a net income tax was inconsequential.

Nondiscriminatory and fairly apportioned income taxes levied upon corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce have been upheld since 1918.[13] While the earlier cases involved domestic corporations or corporations maintaining a commercial domicile in the taxing State, the Court pointed out that domicile is not controlling but that foreign corporations may be similarly taxed. In these cases, the tax was levied only on income earned from activities in the taxing State; however, in each case the activities were exclusively interstate. The same result was reached in West Publishing Company v. McColgan,[14] where the corporation taxed was a foreign, not a domestic corporation.

With the exception of cargo in transit in interstate commerce, States may levy property taxes on property located therein, notwithstanding that the property is used exclusively in interstate commerce. Taxes on property such as railroad carriers, etc., which may be in the State only a portion of the year, must be fairly apportioned to the State on the basis of the time spent therein.[15]

Gross receipts from interstate commerce may be taxed if the tax is fairly apportioned to gross receipts earned within the taxing State.[16] Use taxes may be imposed on sales in interstate commerce and the seller required to collect the tax;[17] however, like the corporation privilege tax, the use or sales tax may not be conditioned upon the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. Highway taxes,[18] and taxes on the privilege of maintaining facilities within the taxing State[19] may similarly be imposed on exclusively interstate activities. Both the highway taxes and the taxes on the maintenance of facilities are based upon the protection and benefits provided by the taxing State. The same reasoning applies equally to taxes levied on income from interstate operations.

Despite much hullabaloo to the contrary, I do not believe the Stockham decision is startling nor that it will affect many corporations so drastically as predicted. Some 28 States levy direct income taxes on corporations.[20] A few States will be added to this group; however, the principal change will be in efforts to enforce the present laws which already impose taxes on these corporations.

As heretofore stated, for many years California has taxed corporations which operate in several States and operate in California in intrastate commerce or in interstate commerce. This has been accomplished by fairly apportioning and allocating to California sources a portion of the corporate net income by use of a formula.

There is no evidence that any corporation has been driven from California by this tax. On the contrary, the record indicates otherwise. During the last 10 years California has carried on an active allocation program. In 1949 there were 4,231 accounts in this office subject to allocation. In 1959 there were 12,558 such accounts, almost a 200 percent increase, whereas the total number of accounts subject to corporation taxes in California increased only 120 percent during the same period. Certainly this record indicates that foreign corporations have eagerly shared in the available California business but not on the basis of a tax advantage over local corporations.

What then is the reason for the hysteria now being generated by groups allegedly representing medium and small interstate operating corporations?[21]

Is it really the fear of being taxed on more than 100 percent of their income or the fear of bookkeeping expense? I think not. Rather it may be that since the Supreme Court has turned the spotlight directly on them they fear that they may be called upon to assume their fair share of the tax burdens and that the continuance of their avoidance practices will meet with increasing difficulties.

I believe it unlikely that the States will attempt to tax foreign corporations which have neither property nor employees therein and that if they attempt to do so, the tax may be invalidated under the due-process clause of the U.S. Constitution.

In these days of tight State budgets we cannot always pursue a tax which may be technically and legally due if the cost of collection exceeds the amount of tax collected.

Imposition of income taxes on corporations engaged exclusively in interstate commerce adds no burden on these corporations not borne by other corporations in similar circumstances but which because of a small amount of intrastate business are subject to taxes on income from both interstate and intrastate activities. Every corporation, regardless of its size and operations, imposes burdens upon and receives benefits from State and local governments. The obligation of corporations engaged exclusively in interstate activities to share the burdens of State and local governments is, I believe, long overdue.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will take a good, long look at this proposed legislation, and will vote it down.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alabama such time as he may require.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the other conferees for working out what I regard as an acceptable arrangement. I do not suppose it is perfect, even in the opinion of the Senator from Virginia. But it will provide relief for many small businesses—perhaps not so much actual relief, but relief against the threat of what might be done.

The language of the Senate version of the bill was accepted by the conferees, insofar as section 1 is concerned—which I think is acceptable.

When the bill was before the Senate, I stated on the floor that I felt there was doubt only about the section with reference to independent contractors. I think its intent is good.

There are some who think it may be open to abuse. I think it will bear watching; and in the event we find it does constitute a loophole for abuses, certainly in the future ample opportunity will be given to close such loopholes as may develop.

Personally, my own preference would have been a commission appointed by the President, and composed of experts in this line, who might have made the study a very thorough one. However, the solution arrived at was the one suggested in the House-proposed legislation; that is, to have two competent committees of Congress, the Finance Committee on the Senate side and the Judiciary Committee on the House side, to make a study of what we might call perfecting legislation, or, since there is no cutoff date in this measure, changes which might be necessary to perfect such legislation.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In just a moment. I think the enactment of this legislation will lift a load of fear from many small businessmen who are confronted with this problem—not the problem of paying taxes that they ought to pay. I certainly agree with the Senator that a State ought to have the right to levy a tax that is equitable, fair, and just. I do not think this proposed legislation takes away that right. I think it carefully guards it, as I interpret it. It seeks to remove the fear of further expansion by the various States into the taxing field, beyond what the Supreme Court has ruled as being allowable.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is it not true, however, that under this proposed legislation the State of the Senator from Alabama and my State would be powerless to levy a tax on business done within the borders of our States by an out-of-State company if salesmen came into our respective States and transacted business?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Within reasonable interpretation, I think the Senator's statement is correct; but that has always been my understanding of the law. It is the decision of the Supreme Court, which indicates that the States might go beyond that, which really causes the fear.

Mr. KUCHEL. I say to my friend that 40 years ago, in the case of U.S. Glue Company v. Oak Creek, 247 U.S. 321, the Supreme Court held that a State may impose a fairly apportioned net income tax on a foreign corporation whose business operations within the State are wholly of an interstate character.

I will say to my friend that the State which I represent has had a corporation income tax on out-of-State businesses for many years, I think since 1937, under which my State does exact a tax in that fashion. Minnesota is another State which for many years has had similar legislation. The measure of the tax is the amount of business done within the State.

While I recognize the bill before us is considerably narrowed, I still say, from information I have from my own State government, it would not be fair to say this question has arisen completely as a result of a recent Supreme Court decision.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, but I will repeat what I said a minute ago. It is not so much what the Supreme Court decided, if the Senator reads the decision closely, but it is what may be inferred as to further extensions of these taxing powers that causes the fear.

I do not believe that the Senator from California will find his State injured by this legislation. I think, instead, he will find that many, many small businesses in his State will feel relief from this threatened multiple State taxation and multiple keeping of different systems of bookkeeping and of filling out of forms and other vexatious requirements that would be so burdensome for the typical small business.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. If what the very able Senator from Alabama, chairman of the Select Committee on Small Business, just said were true—this is a matter of opinion—that certainly would be one strong argument in favor of this legislation, in view of the set of circumstances he suggests. I do want most respectfully to say that I disagree with my friend's opinion. In my judgment, there has not yet been brought forward any concrete evidence that any State of the American Union intended to have its legislature adopt punitive legislation in this field.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. I would say to the Senator from California I did not intimate punitive legislation. I think it is a normal operation, but the thing about it that causes concern is the lack of uniformity among the States. The problem would be taken care of if the States could adopt uniform procedures, to make certain no State was taxed unjustly and unfairly, and, furthermore, when it set up a system of bookkeeping for one State, that same system might be used for all the other States. Frankly, I hope the Council of State Governors or some such organization may get to work on that kind of proposal. I know that the American Bar Association is greatly interested in this matter. I spoke to members of the tax section of the American Bar Association, which met at Miami, Fla., 2 months ago. They are greatly interested in it.

With reference to how small businesses feel about this matter, I should like to refer the Senator from California to the hearings before the Senate Select Committee on Small Business. We held hearings within some 60 days after the Supreme Court handed down its decision. We had before that committee representatives of State taxing authorities, representatives of small business, and representatives of big business. We had representatives from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, from the American Bar Association, and from different agencies of that kind, representing groups interested in this bill from all over the country. I refer my friend to those hearings in order to see the fears that small businesses have and the expense some of them have incurred in trying to meet the problems of multiple taxation.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I think the Senator has made an excellent contribution. If it were possible for some uniform procedure to be adopted that the 50 States could adopt, that could form the basis for Federal legislation which would preserve to the States, on a uniform basis, their complete power to tax.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I think something like that could be worked out.

May I say to the Senator from California that my reason for trying to get a cutoff date adopted—the Senator may remember my proposal was to make the act effective only to July 1, 1962—was to require Congress to take further action and perhaps to prod some of these interested groups in coming up with some proposals before that time. I still think it was a good idea. I am sorry that I was not able to sell the Senate on it.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. I want to commend the Senator from Alabama for the fine work he has done in this field, which is a difficult field in which to legislate and in which to write the proper type of legislation, not simply because of conflict between the Federal Government and States, but because of real problems within the States.

Personally, I am grateful for the information the Senator gave before our committee when we started to write this proposed legislation and for the excellent studies he made of the problem.

I did everything in my power to carry out one suggestion he made, and that was with regard to a study commission. I think we should have a study commission of which the Council of State Governors and the Council of State Taxing Authorities should be a part, because I do not believe we are going to solve these problems until we actually sit down around the table and try to iron out some of these problems. I should like to say the Senator is entitled to much credit for his part in bringing this proposed legislation before the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly thank the Senator from Kansas.

By the way, may I say to the Senator from California, in speaking about the problems that small businesses may feel threaten them, the Senator from Kansas, when hearings were being held by the committee, read a letter from his State tax commissioner, or whatever the title is.

Mr. CARLSON. Collector of revenue.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In which he detailed the many different types of tax coverage that his State might impose.

He also discussed some of the practical difficulties in connection with the matter. I thought this showed a very fine understanding on the part of the State tax official.

I remember testimony we had from a State tax official from Georgia, Mr. Fred Cox, who was one of the best informed. Mr. Cox testified before the Small Business Committee and also before the Finance Committee. Mr. Cox showed a fine understanding of the problem.

I believe when we pull it all together we will see the confusion with which the small businessman, who does business in several different States, must feel he is confronted.

I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, do any other Senators desire to speak?

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, this proposed legislation is so important I think it is necessary for us to try to make a record today as to legislative intent.

The basic purpose of S. 2524 is to exempt from State net income taxation a person whose only activity within a particular State is sales solicitation. The term "person" includes corporations and other business entities, as well as individuals. In general, the exemption applies to income derived within a State by any person from interstate commerce if the business activities within such State by or on behalf of such person are limited to "the solicitation of orders by such person, or his representative, in such State for sales of tangible personal property, which orders are sent outside the State for approval or rejection, and, if approved, are filled by shipment or delivery from a point outside the State"—section 101(a)(1).

It is provided, however, that the immunity provisions are not applicable to the imposition of a net income tax "with respect to any individual who, under the laws of such State, is domiciled in, or a resident of, such State"—section 101(b)(2). The purpose of this provision is to preclude such an individual from claiming the exemption of S. 2524 even though the business activities of, or on behalf of, such individual within the State constitute no more than the "minimum activities" specified in the act.

For example, the King Kole Mining Co., an Ohio corporation with all of its mining operations and offices in Ohio, employs John Doe as its sales agent for several of the Southeastern States, including Georgia. Doe lives in Atlanta and, under the laws of Georgia, is domiciled in, or a resident of, Georgia. This fact does not disqualify the company from exemption from the Georgia net income tax provided the only business activities within Georgia by or on behalf of the company are those specified in section 101(a).

I think it is important that we try to clarify this as much as possible, as the legislation is enacted.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to state to the Senator a problem, which concerns particularly businesses in my State. As Senators may know, one of the large industries in Kentucky is the distilling industry. This industry has many problems, but I will refer to only one of its problems, relevant to the pending legislation.

Some States have enacted legislation which variously require a distiller desiring to do business in such States to establish offices or warehouses or be licensed or registered. It appears that the purpose of such legislation might be to domicile involuntarily an out-of-State distilling company. I would assume, that States acting in the scope of their police powers have authority to enact reasonable legislation, to regulate trade in spirits, but if the effect is to require distillers—and among them Kentucky distillers—to domicile themselves involuntarily, for the purpose of taxation, that would be unfair, and a burden on interstate commerce.

I am not going to say I believe these companies are domiciled for taxation, but if they are domiciled, it is for certain police power purposes.

My question is, Is there anything in the conference report which authorizes a State to levy taxes upon the net income of such a distiller, or any other out-of-State business similarly situated, when they are required by State law to be so "domiciled"?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. The Senator is correct in his understanding. There is nothing in the bill which authorizes any taxation by the State. There is a tax immunity provided in the bill in certain situations, but there is nothing in the bill to give the States any power to levy a tax on interstate commerce.

Mr. COOPER. Second, I should like to ask if there is anything in the bill which could be interpreted by the court as giving authority to a State to levy taxes upon the net income of such an out-of-State person or corporation, where under the State law such a person—and I include corporations and companies, of course—has the statutory duty of taking certain legal steps in the State, such as registering, or establishing an office?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, I think the report makes it clear there is nothing in the proposed legislation which would require taxation.

Mr. COOPER. The question of whether a State can impose income taxes upon an out-of-State company by requiring the company to register, or take other steps which would enable the State to claim the company is domiciled in the State, is a question which, of course, is open to resolution by the courts. But there is nothing in the conference report which would give any added effect or interpretative support to such State legislation?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. If the Senator from Kentucky desires, the Senator from Virginia will have inserted in the colloquy exactly what the report says and the protection given against any new taxation. There is nothing which changes the present basis of taxation, except an immunity is given under certain conditions with regard to sales which come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COOPER. I am trying to distinguish between companies which voluntarily enter into a State, establish offices and warehouses, appoint agents, and so on, and those companies which are required to do so by State law. I simply want to ask if it is the opinion of the Senator from Virginia that the courts could give notice to this peculiar and unusual situation, in their interpretation of the State taxing authority in such cases?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. There is nothing in the bill which would preclude the courts from recognizing this problem. The report says:

> Whether business activities other than those described in the bill constitute a sufficient basis for the imposition by a State or political subdivision thereof of a net income tax on income derived from interstate commerce is left for future determination by the Congress, or in the absence of congressional action, by the courts.

There is nothing in the bill to cover that point.

Mr. COOPER. Then the Senator would agree that clearly the courts could interpret such a situation as I have described, as I am sure they have the right to do anyway.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BUSH. How much time remains, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty minutes remain to the minority leader.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, I should like to observe this is a very clarifying report. As one who sponsored, with my good friend, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], one of the bills the committee had under consideration, which resulted in the report to the Senate, I wish to compliment the committee on the final result which has come from this effort. I believe this proposed legislation will afford some comfort and allay some of the fears of many small business corporations.

The proposed legislation has a particular appeal to the smaller companies who do not have large sales forces of their own, are not able to maintain branch offices and extravagant selling organizations. It certainly will give them some relief from the fear or the actuality of multi-State taxation of income pending the results of the findings of the committee which has been set up under the conference report.

So I wish to compliment the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee and other members of the committee on bringing to a successful conclusion this legislative effort.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much time is left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seven minutes remain to the opponents of the conference report. The Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] is controlling the time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, how much time does the Senator from Kentucky desire?

Mr. COOPER. Five minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

(Mr. COOPER addressed the Senate. His remarks appear elsewhere, under an appropriate heading.)

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, has all time been exhausted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield back any remaining time?

Mr. KUCHEL. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired or has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, Senate bill 1748, Calendar No. 518, be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of Sept. 4, 1959.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absent of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceed to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a report on Negro voter registration in the South, issued by the Southern Regional Council, dated 1959.

Mr. President, despite the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, amazingly little progress in securing voting rights for Negro citizens has been made.

The report indicates practically no progress at all in 1957 and 1958. It shows a purported increase of about 66,000 in registration, but actually that figure cancels itself out because of imperfections in other figures used for comparison.

Mr. President, I wish to point out that the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], in commenting on the civil rights bill of 1957, said:

> I voted for the civil rights bill, because I believe that the right to vote is the most important instrument for securing justice. I was convinced that steps were needed to safeguard that right. If there are loopholes [in the present law], I believe they should be plugged.

This was said on January 20, 1959, and he made a similar statement on August 6, 1959.

I heartily support the Senator from Texas, but I deeply feel that we must back up what we say with legislation in Congress.

It is a fact that unless the Attorney General of the United States is empowered to subpena voting records and local officials are required to retain those voting records for a reasonable time, unless action is taken here to deal with what is called the Macon decision, holding that a State is not amenable to the Civil Rights Act of 1957, we will have a repetition of the same thing, no real progress in 1960, 1961, and 1962.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from this report may be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEGRO AND THE BALLOT IN THE SOUTH

(By Margaret Price)

Opposing forces

Negroes of voting age in the South today are being influenced by two distinct forces.

On one side is the Nation as a whole. Congress has passed the first civil rights legislation since Reconstruction. Federal courts have spoken with increasing frequency and clarity on the right of every American to legal equality and justice.

On the other side, stand local custom and resistance to change. In this camp there is a vocal, sometimes violent and threatening element. There are also many political candidates who use racism as a stepping-stone to public office. What these elements lack in national support is offset, at least temporarily, by the fact that they are on the scene. The threat of Main Street often can be more real than the hope of Washington.

Negro southerners are caught in the middle by other factors. If more of them voted, they undoubtedly would benefit by improved educational, economic, and political opportunities. But, on the other hand, only when their educational and economic levels are raised can many be persuaded to vote. By the same token, politicians who could aid in their struggle for first class citizenship cannot be expected to seek their vote until enough are registered to make it worthwhile to run the risk of condemnation by many white voters. However, to many Negroes it is not worthwhile to run the risk of registering—and it still is a risk in many places—until candidates seek their votes and they can expect the same rewards as white voters.

Currently, it cannot be said that either the proponents or opponents of equal suffrage are winning. In the States where the most reliable figures are available, the number of Negro registrants dropped slightly between 1956 and 1958. However, in this off-year election period, registration dropped over the Nation. Even the fact that there was no sharp decrease in Negro registrants might be considered something of an achievement in light of the South's tensions, sporadic violence, tightening of voter registration laws, and the purging of voting rolls in the intervening 2 years.

The influence of basic national forces indicates that the long range prospect is for a steady, if slow, growth in Negro suffrage in the South. As Negroes improve their educational and economic standing, their interest in voting can be expected to grow. Along with this growth should come an expanded, experienced leadership. If the trend toward urbanization continues, more Negroes can be expected to vote in cities, which are generally more permissive. The existing new Federal agencies also may be expected in the long run to encourage more Negroes to exercise their basic civil rights.

However, there seems to be no reason to expect a sudden, dramatic rise in the number of Negro voters in the South, for the obstacles which have restricted Negro voting in the recent past are still strong.

This report will review the developments since 1956 which have brought both new problems and new hope for the political future of Negro southerners.

In addition, studies of three southern counties are included to spotlight forces influencing specific areas. These deal with a northern Louisiana parish which experienced a wholesale removal of Negroes from voting lists, a South Carolina coastal county, and a Deep South Black Belt county.

CURRENT NEGRO REGISTRATION

In mid-1956, an estimated 1,238,038 Negroes were registered in the 11 Southern States. At the close of 1958, there were an estimated 1,303,827 registered, a gain of 65,789.

This apparent gain is somewhat misleading, however, largely because the 1956 estimate of Negro registrants in Tennessee proved low in light of later available information.

On the other hand, the 1956 total for South Carolina probably was inflated, since the available figures there were based on out-of-date registration rolls which undoubtedly carried the names of some who had died or moved. Since then, the State has had a complete reregistration as required every 10 years. Both white and Negro totals dropped sharply.

In the eight States where the Southern Regional Council was able to obtain reliable figures, the number of Negroes registered in 1958 totaled 1,028,827, as compared to 1,074,672 in 1956, a drop of 45,845.

These eight included Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Virginia, where registration figures all came from official sources. In North Carolina, a statewide estimate was made by the executive secretary of the State election board. In Texas, SRC sponsored a county-by-county check, the first of its kind in recent memory.

Of the remaining three States, Tennessee presented a special problem in obtaining data. There is no central source for registration figures and any estimates are of necessity always speculative. At election time, even the number of precincts in the State is in dispute. Judging by the number of votes cast in Tennessee in the presidential race of 1956, the previous estimate of all eligible voters available to SRC was low. If the overall strength was underestimated in 1956, it seems likely that the Negro portion of that total also was low. The 1958 estimate was obtained from a veteran capitol reporter.

In Mississippi, for lack of an official source, observers in the State interested in Negro suffrage were relied upon. These generally estimated the number of qualified Negro voters in the State at 20,000, the same figure used since 1952. They felt there had been no increase because of the State's stringent racial restrictions and because the number of Negroes has declined in Mississippi.[1]

As for Alabama, scene of some of the South's strongest resistance to racial change, there also was no central, official source for registration figures. An estimate of 70,000 Negro voters there was made by MacDonald Gallion, attorney general of Alabama, in testimony before a congressional committee in Washington in April 1959.

Virginia figures were revised after SRC issued an interim report on voting in the fall of 1958. In October, the secretary of the State board of elections gave the number of Negroes registered in the counties (cities are listed separately in Virginia) as 82,423, based on estimates submitted to him by the various counties. In January 1959, after the board had met, Negro registration in the counties was listed at 40,455, a drop of nearly 42,000. (At the same time, the white registration figures for the counties went up nearly 45,000 from the October total.) [2]

The foregoing suggests the difficulty of obtaining reliable, current registration figures. Even States which have a central source for registration data usually can rely only on figures submitted by the various localities and except in some of the larger cities, there is generally no sustained procedure for keeping the rolls up to date. The names of persons who have died or who have moved often are not struck. When a State has had a periodic reregistration, as South Carolina had in 1958, the new figures will be reasonably accurate for several years. On the other hand, a researcher is confronted by such discrepancies as are obvious in the Georgia estimates, where about 50 counties report more white voters than there were white residents over 18 (voting age in Georgia) in the 1950 census. These are rural counties, most of which have been losing population since 1950.

The following table shows the changes in Negro registration over the past 11 years:

Negro registration [1]

[1] See appendix for detailed sources for figures.

Negro registration figures probably are more reliable than those for whites. As stated in the 1956 study, Negro registration is supervised more carefully by officials and also is made up largely of names which have been on the books not more than 12 or 13 years; thus, it is less likely to be inflated by the names of persons who have moved or have died.

In Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina, where official figures showed a decline in Negro registration, the number of qualified white voters also dropped.

An estimated 25 percent of the eligible Negroes were registered in the South in 1956, as compared to 60 percent of the white citizens of voting age. The 1958 total represents about the same percentage, a little over 25 percent of the Negroes of voting age at the time of the 1950 census. (Interim population figures do not have an age breakdown.)

The number of registrants who actually vote lowers the score of the region's political participation even more. For example, of some 20,000 Negroes registered in Mississippi, officials there estimated that only 8,000 had paid the poll tax and only about 7,000 voted in 1956.

The South continues to lag generally behind the rest of the country in the percentage of eligible citizens who vote. The one-party system and the thousands of Negroes who do not or cannot vote are contributing factors. In the 1956 presidential election the percentage of adults of voting age who cast their ballot ranged from the top of 77.3 percent in Idaho and 76.6 in Connecticut to the lowest percentages in the 11 Southern States. They ranked 38–48, in this order:

	Percent voting
Florida	48.4
North Carolina	47.6
Tennessee	46.0
Arkansas	39.9
Louisiana	39.3
Texas	38.0
Virginia	34.2
Georgia	30.4
Alabama	28.4
South Carolina	24.5
Mississippi	22.1

NEW LAWS AND THE COURTS

In 1957 Congress enacted the first civil rights legislation since the post-Civil War years. This did not bring immediate benefit for prospective Negro voters, but rather the voice of defiance from officials in parts of the South.

Negroes themselves were slow to file well-documented complaints with the new Civil Rights Commission. This was due in part to Negro fears, general political apathy in the South and Negro concentration on school desegregation. However, by April 1959, in hearings before a House Subcommittee on Appropriations, the Commission reported it had received the following voting complaints from the South:[3]

	Total	Sworn	Unsworn
Alabama	119	104	15
Arkansas	6		6
Florida	14	12	2
Georgia	1		1
Louisiana	95	88	7
Mississippi	41	40	1
North Carolina	2	1	1
South Carolina	3		3
Tennessee	7	1	6
Texas	1		1
Virginia	2		2
Total	291	246	45

The Civil Rights Act of 1957 set up the Civil Rights Commission and gave it authority to investigate the status of civil rights anywhere in the Nation. The Commission has the power to subpena witnesses and hold hearings to obtain information, but no enforcement powers. The subpena power is backed by the authority of Federal courts to punish refusals by issuing contempt citations. The Commission is charged with reporting its findings and recommendations for additional legislation to the President and Congress.

The 1957 act also created a new Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department which can seek court orders to enforce voting rights, although it does not have subpena powers.

Alabama: The Civil Rights Commission met its first major test in Macon County, Ala. This rural county, home of noted Tuskegee Institute for Negroes and Negro-staffed Veterans Administration Hospital, has a population 85 percent Negro—the highest percentage of nonwhites of any southern county. However, only about 28 percent of Macon's registered voters are Negroes.

The Tuskegee Civic Association reported that 1,110 Negroes and 3,016 white persons were registered in 1958. Since the total white population was estimated at 4,671 in

[1] However, Kenneth Toler, head of the Mississippi bureau of the Commercial Appeal, in an article in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, Dec. 14, 1958, said Negro voting strength in Mississippi was estimated at 35,000. He said this "is probably a record high and results from reported FBI checking on county registrars or threats of agents moving in."

[2] In April 1959 the State board of elections announced that estimates provided by local clerks and registrars showed a new total of 94,311 Negro voters in Virginia at that time.

[3] From the Nation as a whole, including the South, 310 complaints were received, 253 of them sworn.

1957, this meant that almost all white citizens over 21 had registered. The disproportionately low number of Negro registrants is despite the fact that Macon County ranks first in Alabama both in the number of Negro high school and college graduates.

Negroes in Macon County have fought a long battle for their right to vote. At a hearing in Montgomery, Ala., in December 1958, witnesses told the Civil Rights Commission their efforts have been thwarted by a series of delaying and evasive tactics. They told of pitfalls for Negroes who are required to read and copy sections of the Constitution "to the satisfaction of the registrars," of the failure of registrars to take application from Negroes on several regular registration days, and of the Board's policy of allowing an individual Negro to vouch for only two applicants a year. (Alabama requires that a qualified voter vouch for an applicant.) The witnesses told how, when these methods lost their effectiveness, the board either would resign or meet in a place undisclosed to Negroes.

William P. Mitchell, chairman of the Voter Franchise Committee of the Tuskegee Civic Association, said that in the previous 8 years 1,585 Negro applications for registration were made but only 510 granted. He added that hundreds more appeared to file applications but could not do so because only two Negroes were allowed to apply simultaneously in a small, separate room. Mitchell estimated that at the present rate of issuing certificates to Negroes, it would require 203 years to register the approximately 13,000 unregistered Negroes in Macon County then over 21. This estimate did not take into account the yearly increase of population.

The Commission had subpenaed voting officials of Macon and five other rural, south central Alabama counties—Barbour, Bullock, Dallas, Wilcox, and Lowndes, all with a Negro population of from 53 to 82 percent. They were ordered to bring with them voting records for the past 3 years. However, State and county officials refused to produce records and in several instances refused to testify.

Circuit Court Judge George Wallace, unsuccessful prosegregationist candidate for Governor, had seized the records of Barbour and Bullock a month earlier, claiming they were needed for a grand jury investigation of voting frauds. Two days before the Commission met, grand juries impounded the records of Dallas, Wilcox, and Lowndes. The Commission received records from Macon County but they showed only the names of voters already registered and contained none of the requested information about prospective voters who were turned down.

The Commission ended its hearing with a request to the Justice Department for a court order to open voting records in the recalcitrant countries.

Two days later, U.S. District Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr., in Montgomery, ordered the defiant counties to produce registration records and issued subpenas to Circuit Judge Wallace and five registrars in Macon, Barbour, and Bullock Counties. Shortly thereafter, the two subpenaed Macon County registrars resigned and said they would then appear before the Commission since they were no longer registrars and had no records in their possession. In January 1959, in a compromise settlement, State authorities agreed to let the Commission look at registration books without removing them from custody of the registrars in Bullock, Barbour, and Macon Counties. No mention was made of the other three counties where records were impounded by grand juries. None of the officials of these three had refused to testify at the December hearings.

Subsequently, Wallace turned the registration records of Barbour and Bullock over to grand juries before leaving office. His action resulted in a contempt of court charge, but Federal Judge Johnson acquitted him, ruling that Wallace had in fact complied with the court order, though by devious means. (The county grand juries had opened the records to Commission examiners.)

The Commission released a report July 31, 1959, which Director Gordon M. Tiffany said showed "a consistent pattern of denial of equal protection of the laws as regards voting in six Alabama counties" (Macon, Barbour, Bullock, Dallas, Lowndes, and Wilcox).

The report included testimony taken in executive session from four staff members who had examined voting records in the counties involved. They testified that a double standard was used by some Alabama registrars when considering Negro applicants for registration. Negroes, they said, often were disqualified for minor mistakes that did not generally disqualify white applicants. For example, they told of Negro applicants being turned down for writing the letters "M" or "S" instead of "married" or "single"; of one who gave the month and year he became a resident but was rejected because he left out the day.

They said a spot check of accepted applications showed that 16 persons were registered who had made the same type of mistakes as those rejected. Fifteen of the 16 accepted were white. Three of those registered had left blank a question on whether they would "give aid or comfort to the enemies of the U.S. Government or the government of the State of Alabama."

The Justice Department, which made its own independent investigation of Macon County complaints, filed a suit in Montgomery, February 6, 1959, charging that voting officials in Macon County discriminated against Negroes. Judge Johnson dismissed the suit, which would have required the Macon registrars to enroll 13 Negroes the Department contended were qualified.

Central legal problem in the case was the resignation of the registrars before the suit was filed. The Justice Department argued that under Alabama law the resignations could not be effective until successors qualified. Alternatively, in case the resignations were held legal, the State of Alabama was named codefendant. Judge Johnson ruled that the registrars had resigned legally and that the Civil Rights Act allowed the Department to seek injunctions only against individuals, not States. He was upheld in June 1959, by the U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans. The Justice Department announced that the decision will be appealed to the Supreme Court.

In February 1959, the Alabama legislature, without a dissenting vote, passed an act authorizing registration boards to destroy their records. Specifically, boards could destroy questionnaires completed by applicants at the end of the 30-day limit for appealing a board ruling.

Georgia: On September 4, 1958, the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice filed a suit in U.S. District Court against the board of registrars of Terrell County, Ga. It was the first suit filed under section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. This section gives the Attorney General of the United States the right to institute a suit in behalf of citizens denied the right to vote.

The suit asked for an injunction prohibiting registrars from applying stricter literacy standards to Negroes and from delaying applications by Negroes. It sought registration certificates for five Negroes, four of them college graduates. The Government charged they were denied the right to register by discriminatory use of a literacy test.

The Justice Department also indicated the five instances were part of a systematic exclusion of Negro voters. The complaint said there were only 48 registered Negroes of 5,036 of voting age but that 2,679 of the 3,233 eligible white citizens were enrolled. (The Secretary of State's office reported 2,810 registered white voters in Terrell in 1958.)

On January 26, 1959, Federal Judge T. Hoyt Davis dismissed the suit. He ruled that the injunctive clause of the 1957 Civil Rights Act violated States rights and was unconstitutional. The Justice Department appealed and the Supreme Court has agreed to review the case.

The suit was filed several months after Terrell County appeared in the news because of other racial problems. On June 8, 1958, Robert Baker reported in the Washington Post and Times Herald charges of police brutality, as well as of unsuccessful attempts by Negroes to register. Subsequently, Federal investigators proposed indictments based on the deaths of two Negroes, the pistol wounding of another, the beating of one, and the allegedly illegal detention of a fifth. However, a Federal grand jury refused the Government's request to indict three policemen of Dawson, the county seat of Terrell.

Louisiana: Investigation of voting discrimination complaints from 68 persons in 7 northern Louisiana parishes ran into legal snags also. There, in July, 1959, U.S. District Judge Ben C. Dawkins granted a temporary restraining order preventing the Civil Rights Commission from holding a scheduled hearing. At the same time, Judge Dawkins ordered a three-judge court to rule on the constitutionality of the Commission.

The judge granted the injunction to Louisiana Attorney General Jack Gremillion, who filed the suit on behalf of 17 north Louisiana registrars subpenaed to appear at the hearing. In charging the registrars were denied their constitutional rights, Gremillion claimed they were not informed of the nature and cause of the accusations against them nor allowed to confront their accusers. The Government then asked the court to require those involved in the case to post bond but the request was denied.

Two weeks earlier, the Justice Department filed suit to stop the purge of Negro voters in Washington Parish in southeastern Louisiana. Named as defendants were the White Citizens Council of Washington Parish, four of its members and the parish registrar. The Government said that during the previous 7 months Negro registration in the parish was reduced from 1,517 to 236, as a result of challenges by Citizens Council members. The petition said that in the same period only 10 affidavits were filed questioning the voting rights of white persons. The complaint said that almost without exception the challenging affidavits were based on minor technical deficiencies. Under Louisiana law any two bona fide voters may challenge the right of another voter.

From the outset, investigators of voting rights complaints ran into problems in Louisiana. When one staff member of the Civil Rights Commission went to Webster Parish we found the registrar, who had the State attorney general sitting in as legal adviser, refused to turn over voter records. Although Negroes make up 37.1 percent of the total population of Webster, they represent 1 percent of the registration; of the 8,277 registered voters there in 1958, only 80 were Negro.

The same investigator met a similar refusal in Caddo Parish.

Both registrars contended the investigator failed to comply with two points of State law necessary to obtain their records: he was not a registered voter of Louisiana and he had not obtained a petition signed by 25 Louisiana voters.

Mississippi: The Civil Rights Commission had a difficult time even getting started in Mississippi, one of the first three States where it announced it would investigate registration complaints. (Alabama and Florida were the other two.) When the Commission announced advisory groups would be set up in each State to work with it on civil rights problems, the word from a Citizens Council source in Mississippi was that "anyone who would accept an appointment would be considered a traitor to the South." In Washington, the Commission conceded it was having difficulty in getting a well balanced committee in Mississippi.

Florida: In Florida, where the Commission announced it would look into registration procedures, Gov. LeRoy Collins said he had no objection, so long as the investigation was carried out in a sound manner.

Edward D. Davis, president of the Florida Voters League, a nonpartisan Negro organization, said he had received no complaints at the time of the 1958 primary. Before that, however, Davis said Negroes complained of registration procedures in the four north Florida counties of Liberty, Lafayette, Union, and Gadsden. As the following figures show, Negroes are almost totally disfranchised in these counties:

	1958 population, white	1958 population, Negro	Registered white voters	Registered Negro voters	Population percent Negro	Percent Negroes registered
Gadsden	21,700	28,400	6,310	7	56.7	.11
Lafayette	2,600	200	1,902	0	7.1	0
Liberty	2,200	600	1,706	0	21.4	0
Union	7,100	3,500	2,598	0	33.0	0

The States: Since the Southern Regional Council's 1956 voting survey, no Southern State has eased its registration laws. Five States retain the poll tax—Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia. More important, literacy tests which could be used to limit Negro registration remain in effect in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, South and North Carolina, Mississippi, and Virginia.

Two States tightened registrations laws—Virginia and Georgia.

Georgia passed a new registration law which some of its legislative sponsors frankly admitted was intended to discourage Negro voting. In opposing the bill, the Georgia League of Women Voters claimed the measure would make unequal application possible in several respects:

(1) Every county could have a different voter application form.

(2) Some voters could register with only one trip to the registrar's office; others would have to make a trip to the clerk's office and the registrar's office also.

(3) Registrars could choose any section of the Georgia or U.S. Constitution for applicants to read and write but the law sets no standard of correctness.

(4) Answers were not provided with a set of 30 questions to ask the registrant nor was it made clear who would decide the correctness of the answers.

Virginia put a new "blank paper" registration law into effect in July 1958. It requires new registrants to write from memory, on a blank sheet of paper, answers to 10 questions about age, residence, occupation, etc.

In North Carolina a 1957 State law provides for court appeals from the rulings of registrars. It requires applicants denied registration to file notice of appeal with the registrar the following day; appeals then can be carried to the county boards of elections, and on to the superior court and the State supreme court.

The Louisiana Legislature defeated two bills of Gov. Earl K. Long which would have prevented the removal of any voter from the registration rolls who had been registered for more than 12 months, despite errors found in the registration, and another bill which stipulated that minor errors in the filing of an application would not disqualify the registrant.

Pending before the Alabama Legislature was a constitutional amendment restoring the cumulative poll tax. In 1953 the poll tax law was modified, limiting past due taxes to 2 years, or $3. Previously, a voter might have had to pay as much as $36 in accumulated unpaid poll taxes before registering.

The courts: In November 1958, a three-judge Federal court dismissed a suit brought by a Negro minister, the Rev. H. D. Darby, who in effect contended that Mississippi registration laws were designed to be administered arbitrarily and were used to discriminate against Negroes. The NAACP announced the suit would not be appealed but would instead be referred to the Civil Rights Commission.

The Supreme Court of the United States denied the appeal of a Negro woman, Mrs. Louise Lassiter, to enjoin North Carolina registrars from using literacy tests if an applicant were otherwise qualified. In a unanimous decision, the Court said the tests apply regardless of race and are "one fair way of determining whether a person is literate."

Source: Secretary of State O. Frank Thornton, as reported in the State (Columbia, S.C.), May 24, 1958. The South Carolina Legislative Manual, 1959, prints county registration figures as of June 10, 1958 (p. 358); the figures given above were reported by the secretary of state as of May 10, 1958. The later figures are not used because they are not broken down by race. The difference, however, is slight: a total State registration of 536,206, or 1,200 less than the May 10 report used here. Population figures: State board of health, Jan. 1, 1957.

Texas—Statistical estimates of qualified Negro voters

EXPLANATION.—Texas has no personal registration for voting, and the closest thing to it is poll tax payment. The poll tax is levied on all between the ages of 21–60, with a few classes of people (e.g., some physically disabled) exempted from payment. For these latter persons to vote, they must obtain a certificate of exemption; so also must persons over 60 who reside in a city of 10,000 or more population. Persons over 60 living in smaller places need not get a certificate to vote, if otherwise qualified. The table below, therefore, shows (1) number of poll taxes paid; (2) number of certified, or listed, exempts; (3) number of unlisted exempts, i.e. persons over 60 living in places of less than 10,000 population. Some of this third group, of course, may not realize that they are eligible to vote.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I point out that those of us who are fighting for a civil rights bill at this session are not talking against the wind. We are talking about a reality, and the biggest thing uppermost in respect of reform in the South is reform of voting procedures so that more people will have the right to vote.

These figures indicate that we are faced with a great deal of nullification and relatively little progress. I believe that shows why Congress should amend the act.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an article entitled "Negro Registration Is Set Back in South," written by Claude Sitton, and published in the New York Times of Sunday, August 30, 1959.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEGRO REGISTRATION IS SET BACK IN SOUTH

(By Claude Sitton)

ATLANTA, August 29.—Racial tension generated by the school desegregation controversy has all but checked the growth of Negro voter registration in the South, according to the Southern Regional Council.

In a report released today, the interracial agency said purges, threats, slowdowns, evasions and outright refusals to register Negroes had been employed in some areas.

"Negroes in parts of the South now feel they run a greater risk in trying to register than at any time since the outlawing of the white primary in 1944," it declared.

The council said its first full-scale survey of the suffrage problem since 1956 had also shown a devaluation of the ballot of those Negroes who had been able to overcome the barriers and reach the polls.

This was attributed to the efforts of racists to make the support of the minority race a political liability.

OPTIMISM VOICED

Despite these setbacks, optimism was voiced over the longrun outlook. The council said this was for "a steady, if gradual, increase in Negro political participation—along with rising economic and social status."

A full report on the survey, entitled "The Negro, and the Ballot in the South," by Margaret Price, will be published next week.

The council sponsored the study as a part of its effort to improve race relations in the South.

SMALL RISE NOTED

The agency said an estimated total of 1,303,827 Negroes were registered in the 11 States covered by the survey at the end of 1958. This was an increase of 65,798 from the 1956 total. However, it went on:

"This apparent gain is somewhat misleading, however, largely because the 1956 estimate of Negro registrants in Tennessee proved low in light of later available information.

"In the 8 States where Southern Regional Council was able to obtain reliable figures, the number of Negroes registered in 1958 total 1,028,827, as compared to 1,074,672 in 1956, a drop of 45,845."

The report showed that 25 percent of the eligible Negroes and about 60 percent of the eligible whites were registered in the South in 1956. The 1958 total, it said, represented approximately the same percentage.

ALL-WHITE REGISTRATION

Twenty-nine southern counties have no Negroes registered, according to the council. These include 1 in Virginia, 1 in South Carolina, 2 in Georgia, 3 in Florida, 2 in Alabama, 1 in Tennessee, 15 in Mississippi, and 4 in Louisiana.

"The majority have populations over 50 percent Negro," it pointed out.

However, the council contended that there were other counties in the South where Negroes could register in greater numbers if they wished.

The council said there had been a decrease during the 2 years in the number of Negro voter registrants in Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, and South Carolina.

It noted that none of the 11 States surveyed had eased its registrations law during the 2-year period since its last study.

STATE LAWS TIGHTENED

Two—Virginia and Georgia—tightened voting requirements. Five still retain the poll tax. And seven States have literacy tests that could be used to restrict Negro registration.

"The disturbed atmosphere in much of the South, created by resistance to school desegregation, clearly has retarded the normal growth of Negro suffrage," declared the report.

"The fear and hostility generated by demagogs has dampened both Negro initiative and white acceptance of Negro political participation."

In the discussion the watering down of the Negro power at the polls, the council said that in normal times no serious office-seeker would deliberately antagonize a sizable number of voters. But it went on:

"In many parts of the region, emotionalism surrounding the segregation issue had led to a sharper division of voters along racial lines. Extremists in and out of public office have based their political appeals on racial fears and antagonisms.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield if I have any time.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator what the report of the Southern Regional Council shows about Negro registration in Burke County, N.C.

Mr. JAVITS. I cannot tell the Senator what it shows about each particular county. I think it shows that North Carolina has a better record than other States in the South.

May I point out, Mr. President, that by way of balancing that fact, in 29 communities in the South in which the Negro population is 50 percent or more, there is not any Negro registered on the voting rolls. I will give the Senator credit for what took place in his State, in certain parts of it, but I think we ought to have a pretty balanced picture.

Mr. ERVIN. My reason for asking that question is that 2 years ago the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] placed in the RECORD reports of the Southern Regional Council which failed to show any Negro registered in Burke County, N.C., which is my home county. I know that there are hundreds of Negroes registered in Burke County, and I also know of a considerable number of Negroes in my own precinct who are registered and who vote. When the records of the Southern Regional Council were presented to the Senate 2 years ago, they omitted giving registration figures for Negro electors in many North Carolina counties where thousands of Negroes were registered, and were used as a basis for incorrect inference—an event which usually happens where the truth is only partially told. I point this out to show that the records of the Southern Regional Council cover the subject partially, and the inferences drawn from them are not accurate in many cases.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator is at liberty to submit any figures he wishes. I will submit tables by counties. Unfortunately, we are often frustrated in obtaining information.

MR. AVRAHAM HARMAN, THE NEW AMBASSADOR FROM ISRAEL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the new Ambassador from Israel, Mr. Avraham Harman, who will succeed Mr. Abba Eban, is now here in the United States to take up his new duties. He is no stranger to our shores, and like his gifted and distinguished predecessor, he has made many friends in America.

Mr. President, I salute the incoming Ambassador from Israel and wish him every success in his new post.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following editorial from today's New York Herald Tribune entitled, "New Ambassador From Israel," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW AMBASSADOR FROM ISRAEL

Israel's new Ambassador to the United States is a welcome figure here. Avraham Harman is no stranger. From 1953–55 he was Israeli consul general in New York, and prior to that he was a counselor to his country's delegation to the United Nations. He has also been consul general in Montreal. He knows our part of the world and its people well.

Mr. Harman was born and educated in Britain, worked for a time in South Africa, and settled in Palestine in 1940. His story is typical of many Israelis—men and women born and reared elsewhere, fulfilling in their lifetimes the Biblical promise of the ingathering of the exiles, devoting their skills and their lives to the renewal of their ancient homeland. In his new mission to Washington Mr. Harman succeeds a popular and respected Ambassador in Abba Eban. We are sure he will meet his task well.

THE NEED FOR HIGHWAY FINANCING LEGISLATION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I note with great satisfaction that the House Public Works Committee has just voted to accept the proposal of the Ways and Means Committee for a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax for a period of 22 months. This is very good news. The controversy over the best way to finance the Federal highway program is an important one, and thus deserves the careful attention that it has so far received. Many of us will be greatly disappointed if the differences of opinion on how to finance our highways are allowed to kill this vital program for the coming year. The necessity of having a highway bill before adjournment is widely recognized. Already many States—including my own—have been forced to curtail road-building activities as a result of the discontinuation of the payment of Federal highway funds.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following letter which I received from Mr. Harry R. Mason, a county highway engineer in New York State and the secretary of the New York State County Highway Superintendents Association be printed in the RECORD at the completion of my remarks. This letter is typical of the many which I have received requesting that I do all that I am able, to see that Congress passes a new highway financing bill before adjournment.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK STATE COUNTY HIGHWAY SUPERINTENDENTS ASSOCIATION,
Fonda, N.Y., August 27, 1959.

Hon. KENNETH KEATING,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KEATING: As a county highway engineer and as secretary of the New York State County Highway Superintendents Association, I urge you to support the Fallon bill (H.R. 8678) to continue the interstate highway program.

Any curtailment or cutback in the program would be a serious blow to the transportation and economy of the country. In Montgomery County, which is now recovering from an economic low point, interstate projects planned will be of great help to the area in attracting new industry. If some interim financing measure is not approved to continue the program, it is probable that proposed projects on the State highway system in this area will be canceled.

Any slowdown now in construction will serve to increase the problems in the future on our highway system due to the expected increase in the number of vehicles in this country in the next few years.

I hope that in your capacity as Representative of Montgomery County, that you will act in favor of continuing this important highway program.

Very truly yours,

HARRY R. MASON,
Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF COPYRIGHT ACT OF 1909

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, for a long time, and in fact over a period of more than 12 years, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary has been considering proposed legislation which would amend the Copyright Act of 1909 by removing a specific exemption from that act which provides that performance of copyrighted musical works by coin-operated music machines shall not be deemed a public performance for profit. In practice, this 50-year-old exemption means that the 500,000 so-called jukeboxes in the United States are accorded the special privilege, alone among all commercial users of copyrighted music, of taking musical property from its owners without their permission, and profiting from the use of such musical property without payment to the creators of the music.

Under the leadership of the eminent senior Senator from Wyoming, the Copyright Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary made a thorough study of all the issues, which it embodied in Senate Document No. 155—84th Congress, 3d session—entitled "A Review of the Evidence Relating to the Copyright Law as it Applies to Jukeboxes." As a result of this study, and of hearings held by the able chairman of the subcommittee, the full Judiciary Committee, in the closing days of the 85th Congress, favorably reported a bill, S. 1870, to eliminate the special clause exempting jukeboxes, and thus afford the owners of the music compensation for the use of their property in coin-operated machines. The findings of the committee were embodied in Senate Report No. 2414—85th Congress, 2d session. Because of the lateness of the session, however, no action was taken on the measure by the 85th Congress.

The bill has been reintroduced in the 86th Congress as S. 950, and a somewhat similar measure in the House, H.R. 5921. Hearings have been held recently on H.R. 5921 by our sister committee in the House, and under guidance by the chairman of the House committee, proponents and opponents of the measure are being brought together to discuss ways and means of working out reasonable and equitable compensation to the composers and other copyright owners.

As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I have studied the evidence, and have concluded that composers are entitled to a fee for the performance of their music in jukeboxes. The musical property created by the hearts and brains of Irving Berlin, Cole Porter, Hammerstein and Rodgers, George Gershwin, Jerome Kern, and a multitude of others deserves and should receive under the Copyright Act just as much lawful protection as a man's house or farm or crops, or any other real or tangible property he possesses. The strength of our economic system depends upon the incentives which our Nation provides to its citizens, to encourage them to earn, accumulate and hold the just rewards of their toil. I urge my fellow Members of the Senate to give their attention to this apparently trivial but significant alienation of property which has been allowed to exist for 50 years, and to restore to their rightful owners the musical property being wrongfully taken from American composers by jukebox operators.

EFFECT OF STEEL STRIKE ON RAILROAD INDUSTRY

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, as one who has spent considerable time in the study of the Nation's transportation system, particularly surface transportation, I cannot help becoming increasingly alarmed over the effect which the steel strike is having on the Nation's carriers, especially on the railroads, their essential maintenance and building programs, and the increasing numbers of their furloughed employees.

When the last steel strike occurred, in 1956, freight carloadings for the 5-week period of the strike's duration were about 800,000 below normal, and at least 750,000 cars of this loss, or 150,000 cars a week, were attributed directly to the strike. Losses in the first 5 weeks of the present strike, as recently announced by the Association of American Railroads, show that the 1956 experience is being substantially repeated. Carloadings for the 5 weeks ended August 22 were 875,000 below normal. Included in this loss were 123,000 carloads of coal, 44,000 carloads of coke, 383,000 carloads of ore, and 325,000 carloads of other or related commodities.

Translated into dollars, the loss of 875,000 carloads has meant $220 million in revenue lost to the railroads. This loss continues at a rate of approximately $40 million for each week that the strike is allowed to continue. But the effects cannot be measured in dollars alone. One of the most serious and disturbing aspects is the effect that a prolonged strike with its continuing revenue losses of that magnitude is certain to have on the ability of railroads to continue their vital programs for the purchase of new plant and equipment and for clearing up the large backlog of deferred maintenance left over from the economic recession of 1958.

Severe losses of traffic and revenue in 1958 not only forced many railroads to the brink of insolvency but also triggered heavy retrenchment programs, both in new construction and in maintenance, throughout the industry. A measure of economic recovery this spring, combined with emergency measures taken by Congress in the Transportation Act of 1958, have enabled many railroads to resume their vital programs for improvement and rehabilitation. One large eastern railroad, for example, has recently announced ambitious plans for new car construction, repair, and rehabilitation to cost $200 million. There has been an encouraging increase in the ordering of new freight cars throughout the industry, with the result that the backlog of cars on order today is more than 50 percent above the very low level of a year ago.

Railroads today should be building, rebuilding, and repairing cars and other equipment for all they are worth. Anything less is almost certain to leave them unprepared to cope with the great resurgence of economic activity expected to occur after the strike ends.

The steel strike is having other serious human consequences. On the basis of estimates by the Railroad Retirement Board, more than 45,000 railroad employees have been furloughed, due to the strike. If the strike continues for as long as 6 weeks, the Board estimates that additional thousands of railroad employees will be idled.

The burden of this unemployment is not spread evenly among railroads throughout the country, but is borne mainly by employees whose railroads serve steel-producing companies or are major haulers of commodities such as coal and iron ore used in steel production. One railroad in the Pittsburgh area, anticipating a loss of 90 percent in carloadings as the strike continues, may be forced to furlough as many as 2,000 of its total of 3,100 employees. A large eastern road has been compelled to furlough 6,200 workers, of which 3,500 are train crews and 2,200 are in shop and track maintenance. The same is true in varying degree of no fewer than a dozen major carriers of steel and related products.

Railroad workers are, of course, entitled to compensation under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act; and the amounts received will help to alleviate suffering and hardship for many of those affected. But these payments will only lessen the hardship, not eliminate it. Here again, however, the effect of adding thousands of new beneficiaries to the railroad unemployment rolls will be to add even greater financial burdens to the already hard-pressed railroads. This is because the cost of benefits paid out under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is borne entirely by the railroad companies.

Already the Railroad Retirement Board has paid out in benefits to strike-furloughed railroad employees over $5,200,000. If the strike lasts 8 weeks, the Board estimates that it may pay out, in unemployment benefits, attributable solely to the steel strike, as much as $28 million or $29 million. Of this amount, $21 million would be paid in benefits while the strike is in progress, and $7 million to $8 million in benefits after the strike ends, since it is not anticipated that all employees will be called back immediately when work in the steel mills resumes. If the strike should last longer than 8 weeks, the additional cost to railroads, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, could continue at a rate of $3 million to $4 million a week.

Not to be overlooked, of course, is the serious loss of tax revenue to Federal, State, and local governments that is the inevitable result of reduced business and employment in the transportation industry. With the tax rate on corporations at 52 percent, the Federal Government alone is absorbing no small part of the weekly $40 million revenue loss from reduced traffic volume. And with 45,000 railroad employees on unemployment insurance rolls, an additional substantial loss in returns from individuals is incurred.

In short, Mr. President, the time has come when this strike must be settled. The damage being done to our economy, our people, and our transportation system far outweighs the particular dispute between the steel companies and their employees.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE INTEREST RATE CEILING ON LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it is quite clear that the administration and its newspaper allies in the financial community are trying to pressure the Congress of the United States into raising the interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds before we adjourn for the year.

They cite the current level of interest rates in the capital market as proof that the Government cannot compete for money unless it can offer more than 4¼ percent on long-term borrowing.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that a look at recent interest rate trends suggests that the Congress should take these assertions with a large grain of salt.

What these charts remind us is something we all know—that the market is always greatly influenced by psychological factors. When it anticipates higher rates, lenders hold back; and the mere fact that they hold back will tend to push rates upward.

This being the case, we would expect that when the President first asked the Congress to raise the ceiling, the rates would be pushed up. We would expect that when it appeared the Congress did not intend to comply, the rates would level off or decline. Finally, we would expect that when the President renewed his pressure, and when the current editorial campaign began, the rates would again begin to rise.

A look at the figures shows that all three of those things occurred.

Interest rates rose rather rapidly during the recovery from the recession, last fall. But along about October they stabilized. They remained fairly stable through March. It was not until April that they began to rise again. Senators will recall that April was about the time when the "dope stories" first began to appear—stories that the President was going to ask for an increase in the ceiling on Government bonds.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the interest rate figures for the period from October 1958 through March 1959 as taken from Economic Indicators, published by the Council of Economic Advisers.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Percent per annum]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, these figures show that during the period from last October to last March the interest rate on Government bonds, both short-term and long-term, fluctuated within a rather narrow range; that the rate on high-grade municipal bonds actually fell; and that the rate on corporate bonds and prime commercial paper was almost stable.

In the spring of this year, a rather sharp upturn took place. What were the new factors in the situation? I suspect that the most important new factor was the request of the President, which was made on June 8, but was rumored some weeks before, that he would request an increase in the interest rate on long-term Government bonds.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table which shows the trend in interest rates between March and June, as taken from the same source, Economic Indicators.

There being no objection, the table showing the trend in interest rates was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Percent per annum]

Period	U.S. Government security yields		High-grade municipal bonds (Standard & Poor's)[3]	Corporate bonds (Moody's)		Prime commercial paper, 4–6 months
	3-month Treasury bills[1]	Taxable bonds[2]		Aaa	Baa
1959: March	2.852	3.92	3.76	4.13	4.85	3.35
April	2.960	4.01	3.84	4.23	4.86	3.42
May	2.851	4.08	3.97	4.37	4.96	3.56
June	3.247	4.09	4.04	4.46	5.04	3.83

For footnotes, see table above.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, these figures show a marked increase in the interest rate in each category.

Then what happened? Within a few weeks, it became apparent that the Congress was not inclined to comply with the President's request. At that point, the interest rate declined again. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the weekly figures for the period from July 18 to August 15.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Percent per annum]

Period	U.S. Government security yields		High-grade municipal bonds (Standard & Poor's)[3]	Corporate bonds (Moody's)		Prime commercial paper, 4–6 months
	3-month Treasury bills[1]	Taxable bonds[2]		Aaa	Baa

1959: July 18	3.401	4.08	4.05	4.47	5.09	4.00

Aug. 1	3.047	4.10	3.97	4.45	5.07	3.99
8	3.043	4.08	3.94	4.43	5.08	3.89
15	3.150	[4] 4.06	3.94	[4] 4.42	5.09	[4] 3.88

For footnotes, see table above.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, these figures show a decline in each of the categories.

But on August 25, the President sent his message to the Congress, renewing his request that the interest rate ceiling be lifted. At about the time this message was being drafted—and, of course, "leaked"—up went the rates again. The week the message was sent, a big rise occurred.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point figures for the period from August 15 to September 5, insofar as these figures are available at the Council of Economic Advisers. The last figures in each column are, in some cases, preliminary, and are subject to revision.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Percent per annum]

Period	U.S. Government security yields		High-grade municipal bonds (Standard & Poor's)[3]	Corporate bonds (Moody's)		Prime commercial paper, 4-6 months

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, while the trend in bond prices and rates is never due to any single cause, I think the figures over the past year show clearly that psychological factors have been at work.

In my judgment, Congress could make a really constructive contribution to improving the present rather chaotic condition of the Government bond market by adjourning without lifting the 4¼ percent ceiling on the interest rate on Government bonds. The psychological effect of such action might well bring interest rates down to a more reasonable figure, somewhere near where they were last fall, before the present drive to lift the interest rate ceiling began.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to comment briefly on the remarks that have been made by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I certainly agree with him that psychological factors have had some effect upon interest rates, which have risen. They are, of course, not the only cause for the rise in interest rates.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may we have order? I cannot hear my friend from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I cannot hear myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. BUSH. I say, psychological factors undoubtedly have had some effect on interest rates, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out; but I should like to observe that they are only one of the factors. I believe the reason why the psychological factors exist has not been adequately explained by those who take exception to the existence of high interest rates.

The existence of high interest rates is a situation that has always accompanied booms in business, periods of prosperity; and one might say that firm interest rates or rising interest rates are the price of prosperity. That has been so through the ages. It has been so in every country in the world. It is true today of the countries in the world that have boom conditions, where prosperity is enjoyed, where business and commercial activity are making demands upon the money markets.

I have not checked the figures lately, but I understand the Government of Canada is paying 5 percent for money it must borrow from time to time. Canada's currency, as I learned 2 days ago, is selling at 105 percent of par value in relation to the American dollar.

The psychological factors in this interest rate matter are very important, indeed; but, as I view them, they are the result of a very real apprehension on the part of American investors as to the value of the American dollar. This apprehension is felt not only by people within the United States, but is being increasingly felt by those abroad who have balances in the United States, and who fear the attitude expressed by my good friend from Pennsylvania and others who share his views about interest rates, who fear the effect such an attitude may have upon the value of the American dollar in relation to the value of other exchanges throughout the world.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I will yield in a minute, but I want to say this situation is becoming increasingly serious, and for this reason: While it appeared some time ago that we might have a balanced budget in the current fiscal year, it now appears, according to the last information I have from the Director of the Budget, that we may have a deficit in this current fiscal year in the neighborhood of a half billion dollars.

But that is not all. The spending that has been built into our Government, which will take effect in the fiscal year 1961, will cause another increase in expenditures, unavoidably, of something upward of $2 billion for fiscal year 1961.

It is this apprehension that disturbs very much the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe the Governors of the Federal Reserve Board as well. So it is their desire that, if we are going to face additional deficits in this fiscal year and next year, we do not add to the inflationary forces by leaving the Treasury in a position where it has to finance these deficits from the short-term money market, because it is quite clear to all objective students of the situation that short-term financing, the financing of the deficits through the banking system, is unquestionably an inflationary procedure.

So the situation is very grave, and I do believe that it calls for action by the Congress before the Congress goes home.

I observe that the House is thinking of sending us a bill which will take the interest ceiling off savings bonds. That is a desirable thing to do. I think we should do that. But I believe that bill should be amended in the Senate so as to take the ceiling off all Government bonds, in order to put the Federal Government in a position to be able to compete with other borrowers on at least an equal basis, and not leave the Federal Government in a position where it is forced to go into the short-term money market, where its existence as a big borrower has already had a tremendous effect on raising interest rates in the short-term money market.

Forcing the Federal Government into that short-term money market has had an effect in raising short-term interest rates, which normally should not be as high as long-term interest rates. I think perhaps it is that single factor that has had more to do with the rise in the short-term interest rates than has any other single factor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BUSH. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator intend, and do any of his colleagues who support the administration intend, to offer an amendment on the floor of the Senate to the bill which it is said the House will send to the Senate, increasing interest rates only on E-type savings bonds?

Mr. BUSH. That is my present intention. I do not know what will be offered by members of the Finance Committee, and I would not wish to intrude upon any prerogatives which may be theirs by virtue of their positions on that committee. It may be that my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], a member of that committee, will offer an amendment to raise the ceiling. If he wanted to do that, I would be glad to support his motion. But lest the bill pass without anybody doing it, I believe I should be prepared to do it. That is my present intention.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that one of the major factors in bringing the budget out of balance for the current fiscal year has been the very substantial increase in interest rates which has occurred during the tenure of office of the Eisenhower administration?

Mr. BUSH. I respectfully suggest that the Senator has put the cart before the horse. It has been just the reverse. The necessity of financing the deficits in the budget has brought about the added demand for money, to a very large extent, which, of course, has had some effect on the interest rates.

Mr. CLARK. But it is a fact, is it not, I ask my good friend, that the Eisenhower administration vastly underestimated the amount of interest which they have had to pay on the Federal debt and has accordingly adjusted the budget projections and made their gloomy prognostication of a deficit to a substantial extent because of that increase in interest payments?

Mr. BUSH. I am not sure they did underestimate it. If the Senator says they did, I will not dispute his statement.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Stans said in testimony the other day he had underestimated the interest cost by a half billion dollars—$500 million.

Mr. BUSH. It is not surprising to me he might have done that, under the conditions which have developed.

Mr. CLARK. It is not surprising to me, either.

Mr. BUSH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will be kind enough to yield further, I may say we had a rather enlightening debate on this subject of interest rates yesterday on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, may we have order, please? I should like to hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. CLARK. We had a rather extensive debate on the floor of the Senate yesterday on this subject of interest rates. I regret that my friend from Connecticut was not in the Chamber to hear the debate. If I had known it was going to continue to such a length I would have notified him.

I should like to point out that in the course of the debate it was asserted on our side of the aisle that one of the real reasons why the present bond market is so unsatisfactory is that my good friend from Connecticut and a number of his colleagues have asserted time after time this panic position, this feeling that we are getting into trouble and that chaos is coming into the market. That was the word used by the distinguished Senator from Indiana yesterday. We on our side of the aisle asserted that if our Republican friends would cool off, would remain calm, would advocate that the Federal Reserve Board get back in the market the way it has so many times in the past, and if the Treasury would withdraw its request for an increase in the interest rate ceiling we might get back on a sound basis, but that the President and his supporters on this floor are really causing a large part of the difficulties of which they complain. In other words, in our judgment they have the cart before the horse.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I simply say to that, I shall certainly never agree to remain quiet when I feel I should speak. I do not believe any Senator should fail to warn the Senate or the people of the United States if he sees what is a really grave danger creeping up upon us. I certainly never would agree to be quiet. I would not be intimidated or threatened or otherwise pressured to be quiet in the face of that kind of a situation.

I happen to feel that this is a subject concerning which I know enough to have a very real conviction. I believe that the Senator from Pennsylvania, while he is thoroughly sincere in his position, is thoroughly mistaken. I believe that the tendency of the opposition across the aisle to a large extent is to ignore these considerations, which presents our country with a very dangerous situation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. During the debate yesterday, it was suggested that the economic position taken by my good friend from Connecticut and by a number of the financial writers in New York was that of the old-fashioned Ricardo School of Economics, a school which is, we feel, pretty obsolete, which does not really give the true picture with respect to the interest rates.

I know the Senator from Connecticut is absolutely sincere. I hope he will not resent it if I suggest to him he is also a little bit obsolete.

Mr. BUSH. I find myself very much in sympathy with the position taken in this whole debate by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. William Martin. Mr. Martin is not a Republican. He is not a member of my party. He is a member of the Senator's party.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. Martin was appointed by President Truman to the post which he now occupies. He was reappointed when his term expired by President Eisenhower.

The other members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve were appointed by the predecessors of President Eisenhower, with one exception, I believe. I think President Eisenhower has appointed one of the present members of the Board of Governors.

So I do not think the Senator is quite justified in what he says. I do not know what the Ricardo School is.

Mr. CLARK. I am amazed by my friend's statement.

Mr. BUSH. Perhaps I should, but I do not. I do know something about the basic facts of economics, and I believe that the Federal Reserve Board not only has men of judgment and experience who are laying down the policies, but also that the Board has the most able and the finest statistical organization and research organization in the field of economics that we have in this country. I think the Federal Reserve Board should have it, and it does have it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BUSH. I am interested to find, as this situation develops, that the research and statistical organization appears to support very strongly the views which are expressed from time to time before the Congress and otherwise by Chairman Martin and other members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve. I have not noticed any cleavage within that Board, all of whom but one were appointed by some other President than President Eisenhower—by a President of the Democratic Party, to which the Senator adheres.

Mr. CLARK and Mr. ALLOTT addressed the Chair.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber.

The Senator from Connecticut may proceed.

Mr. BUSH. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I share the high regard of the Senator from Connecticut for Mr. William McChesney Martin as an individual——

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, we are not talking about social regard.

Mr. CLARK. I know.

Mr. BUSH. Does the Senater agree with me that Mr. Martin is well qualified to be the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. CLARK. I do not agree with his present policies, and therefore I suppose I would have to dissent from that view, though I have a high personal regard for Mr. Martin.

Mr. Martin came to this job from the presidency of the New York Stock Exchange, and he has spent his whole adult life in the atmosphere of Wall Street. He is a gentleman who agrees with my friend from Connecticut, and I think both of them are mistaken.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. Martin came to his present position from the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to which he was appointed by a Democratic President.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Martin was the youngest president of the New York Stock Exchange in the history of that body.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. Martin came to that position after having been in the Army for 4 years, going from the status of a draftee, from the rank of a private in the U.S. Army, to that of a colonel.

Mr. CLARK. I have never suggested anything adverse to Mr. Martin's character. I made that very clear. I simply think his policy is wrong.

Mr. BUSH. Well, I gathered that. [Laughter.]

Let me say to the Senator, I have repeatedly said to him, and to my other good friends who constantly attack the Federal Reserve Board and its policies, that it is a much more sound approach for Senators, if they really mean what they say on this issue, to present proposed legislation to deal with the situation. I object to these constant attacks on policy which do not have any force or effect so far as the Federal Reserve Board is concerned.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. If Senators believe that the Federal Reserve Board's wings should be clipped, or that its powers should be limited, or that different policies should be established by law, then Senators should propose legislation so that we can deal with the matter on that basis.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. Failure to do that, I submit, makes these constant attacks on the Federal Reserve Board, on the Treasury Department, and on the whole question of interest rates, have a very strong appearance of being purely a political gesture, which I personally believe it is.

Mr. ALLOTT and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

Mr. BUSH. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, in addition to taking action in regard to highways, housing, labor reform and mutual security, it seems to me critically important that this can-do Congress must do something about facing up to the realities of the monetary and fiscal situation brought on by the present business boom.

In that regard I commend most heartily to all my colleagues an astute and logical observation on the dangerous effect that inaction by this session of the Congress could have on the national—yea, even on the world—economy, an editorial written by the editors of the Denver Post, and published in that paper on Wednesday, August 26, 1959, entitled "The Dollar Needs More Muscles," which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DOLLAR NEEDS MORE MUSCLES

Democrats in Congress have decided to try to hold interest rates on Government savings bonds and long-term bonds within artificially low ceilings.

They say they fear a hike in the Government interest rate would be reflected in higher interest rates generally, for persons borrowing to buy cars or homes, for merchants borrowing to buy stocks of goods, for persons borrowing to start new businesses.

"Cheap" or "easy" money, the Democrats believe, helps creditors while "dear" money is of advantage only to lenders.

So, the bill requested by President Eisenhower, to permit the Government to offer more than 3¼ percent on savings bonds and 4¼ percent on long-term bonds, has been tabled in the House Ways and Means Committee, thereby killing it for this session.

We doubt if the Democrats will be able to get much political mileage out of their be-kind-to-borrowers gesture. And their refusal to adjust interest rates to meet current bond market conditions may have serious consequences.

The first effect of the Democratic decision will be to force the Government to put more and more of its debt in short-term bonds on which there is no interest ceiling.

The trouble with short-term Government bonds is that they are virtually the same as cash. If billions of dollars are added to the short-term debt, a vast floating supply of cash or near-cash will be created in the country, adding tremendously to inflationary pressures on prices.

It has just been announced that the Consumer Price Index has climbed to its fourth consecutive record level in 4 months. It would be a good idea to siphon some buying power into long-term bonds but the Democrats in Congress are unwilling to help.

The worst effect of killing the bond interest bill may be its reaction on the world money markets.

Our monetary policies have already weakened confidence in the dollar to some extent. Some countries have been cashing in their dollars for gold.

If we deliberately embrace a policy of "easy" money and rising prices, we will encourage a belief that the United States is not fully responsible as far as Government finances are concerned and that the dollar, long the anchor of free world strength, is no longer to be trusted.

Mr. KEATING and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

Mr. BUSH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wish to commend my distinguished colleague for again calling attention to the very serious problem which we face. The views expressed by Mr. William McChesney Martin time after time make the problem clear. I share my colleague's high regard for Mr. Martin, both as a man and in regard to his ability in his position.

Day before yesterday I addressed the Senate on the urgent need for Congress to enact into law the President's proposal to remove the unnecessary and artificial interest rate ceiling on Government savings bonds and on all other types of Government bonds.

We are fortunately in the midst of a boom. The demand for investment capital is great, and as a result interest rates have increased. Why not? Ours is a free competitive economy and that is the way it works.

The Government meanwhile has a debt, and it must sell bonds. Like everyone else, the Government must sell its obligations at the current asking price for the real savings of our economy—whatever that price may be. For, if the Government simply forces new bonds into the banking system, which it can easily do, this will cause inflation. We all know that inflation hurts every American, especially those who hold savings bonds.

Mr. President, I want to digress a minute and comment further on the point which I have just made, namely, that inflation is especially harmful to those Americans who hold Government savings bonds. This is a well-known fact, and it will continue to be true as long as the interest rate on these bonds is held below 3.26 percent.

The question that comes immediately to mind is who holds these bonds? It is not the bankers. We have heard a great deal about bankers, not the Wall Street barons, and not the presidents of our large corporations by and large. On the contrary, it is the wage earner and the pensioner who hold savings bonds. They are middle income people, and the refusal of Congress to accede to the President's request on interest rates hurts them a great deal.

Mr. President, on the basis of the comments which I have just made, I am particularly interested in seeing that a way be found to raise the interest rate on savings bonds before Congress adjourns. I urge my colleagues to join in this purpose. It is mandatory that we take action to aid and relieve the millions of conscientious middle income Americans who hold these bonds.

However, I shall support the effort of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut and others to comply with the President's request and also the position taken by every well-informed financial writer whom I have read on the subject, and all of the experts on the subject.

I call attention to an excellent article published in the Washington Post of yesterday, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday at page 17707.

Mr. President, I am not learned in the subtleties and complexities of Government monetary and fiscal policy. I would be the first to admit this. But, the more I study this matter, the more I become impressed by the fact that the great majority of informed people who have commented on this subject have strongly and enthusiastically endorsed President Eisenhower's proposal to remove the interest rate ceiling on Government savings bonds and, for that matter, on all other types of Government bonds. Mr. President, this growing public sentiment backing the President on this issue cannot be ignored.

We are facing an international conference to be held within the next few weeks, and if it gets around among our friends around the world that we cannot manage our debt in this country, and the administration is being prevented from managing its debt by the action or inaction of Congress, it will be extremely serious in our relations with those countries.

Mr. BUSH. I should like to compliment the distinguished Senator from New York on what he has said. I think it is very pertinent to the debate.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the distinguished Senators on both sides the fact that the chairman of the conference committee on the Labor-Management Act, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], has been on his feet for some minutes ready to take up the report. Interesting as are the matters now being discussed, they will be presented under pertinent legislation which is to appear before us very shortly. I hope that the distinguished Senators will allow the conference report to be considered and passed upon at their early convenience.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I am very glad that this question has arisen again. I am grateful to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] for having brought it up so that I could have a chance to express myself.

I wish to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] for the views he expressed yesterday in defense of the administration's position respecting this subject. I think what he said was very enlightening and very helpful to an understanding of the subject.

Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this discussion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BUSH. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, or I will yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to say that I have no intention whatever of detaining the Senate any further, other than to suggest that my good friends from Connecticut and New York might with profit read the debate on this subject which took place yesterday.

I shall have nothing further to say, except to remark to my good friend from Florida, in all friendliness and kindliness, that I should have thought he would be the last man in this body to try to take another Senator off the floor.

Mr. BUSH. I have not read the entire debate. I have scanned it with a great deal of interest, but I have not profited by it one bit.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, in reply——

Mr. MORSE. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. MORSE. I believe I have been recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment to reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose with the understanding that I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, nothing is further from my mind than to take the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator who knows his rights from the floor. I was merely suggesting that the Senate has very important business before it, and that although the matters being discussed are of great interest, there will be adequate opportunity to discuss them under proposed legislation which will come up shortly.

Mr. BUSH. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me briefly?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut with the same understanding, that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not believe that the Senator from Connecticut regarded my question to him or my suggestion to him as any effort to take him from the floor.

Mr. BUSH. No.

Mr. HOLLAND. Nor any effort to take my friend from Pennsylvania from the floor. I think that the two Senators I have mentioned know enough about their own rights, and it would be very hard to take them from the floor by any unfriendly action on the part of any Senator. Certainly I had no such intention.

Mr. BUSH. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield with the understanding I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. BUSH. I merely wish to observe that I took no exception whatever to the Senator from Florida calling attention to the fact that the labor bill is ready for discussion. I take no exception whatever to his reminder. I do not wish anything that I said to be so interpreted. I think he is quite right in calling our attention to the situation.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield to me for not in excess of 30 seconds with the understanding that he will not lose his right to the floor?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend from Florida for his friendly and cooperative explanation of his action.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I propose at this time to make my speech setting forth my reasons for not signing the conference report on the labor bill. I prefer to make this speech in advance of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] for two reasons.

First, representatives of the majority have already made public comment in regard to their position on the bill, and I think it is only fair and proper that my reply to them be made at this time.

Second, I think it is appropriate to set forth my detailed objections to the conference report, so that the Senator from Massachusetts, when he presents his discussion on the conference report, will have full knowledge as to the position I have taken in opposition to certain sections of the conference report which he submitted on behalf of the conference over which he so ably presided.

Furthermore, I believe that this course of action will probably prove to be a great time saver in the Senate, because it will spare us from covering again much of the same ground that I would still have to cover in detail if the Senator from Massachusetts were to present his report in the first instance.

At the outset, I am perfectly willing to let the record speak for itself, and let my fellow conferees be my witnesses, as to whether or not, in the long, arduous conference sessions, the senior Senator from Oregon sought to cooperate with the chairman of the conference and his colleagues on the conference; and even though, when we reached certain votes which made it clear that the senior Senator from Oregon could not possibly sign the conference report because of the results of such votes—and so notified the conference—he, however, at the same time made it clear that he would continue to do the best he could to assist the conferees in bringing forth the most acceptable bill, so far as concerned the remaining sections still under discussion.

I hold to the same position today, following my dissent yesterday in conference, which I expressed on television last Sunday to the people of the Nation. At that time I said, in effect, that in my 15 years in the Senate I have never served under a more able chairman of a conference than the Senator from Massachusetts.

We have some very fundamental differences in regard to certain parts of the bill. The Senator from Massachusetts agreed to certain compromises that I could not possibly agree to in order to produce a conference report. I think we have mutual respect, and I think we recognize that each is sincere and intellectually honest in the position he has taken. I believe my chief difference procedurally with the Senator from Massachusetts occurred during the last 2 or 3 days of the conference—in fact, since last Friday, when the Dirksen resolution to ask the Senate for instructions was filed with the Senate. That would have brought the disputed points to the floor of the Senate for instruction.

I have arbitrated a great many labor cases in my professional career, but I have never arbitrated with a strike gun at my head. I have always taken the position that before arbitration on the merits of the issues involved in the case could be conducted impartially, it was necessary for the union to go back to work under a temporary order from the arbitrator; or, if the case involved a lockout, that the employer open the plant or the docks for the continuance of work.

This is an argument by analogy. It is not on all fours, but it has enough common elements to cause me to make it in respect to what I think was the effect of the Dirksen resolution, to have the Senate give instructions on various points on which we were in conflict last Friday.

CONFEREES NEEDED INSTRUCTION

I was for the resolution. I was satisfied, before the resolution was offered to the conferees, that we had reached the point where the Senate ought to give us instructions. At that time requests were being made for compromises which, in my judgment, affected such important legitimate labor rights that have been won over the decades at great cost to American free labor, that I did not believe a compromise procedure should continue in conference with that resolution hanging over our heads.

I was for going back to the conference, but going back to the conference after the Senate had given us instructions on each of the very difficult points over which, at that time, we were obviously deadlocked. Examples of these important points are the no-man's-land issue, bonding, hot cargo, organizational picketing, legitimate secondary boycotts, and the like.

I did not prevail; but, as the record of the conference will show, time and time again I moved, prior to a vote or immediately following a vote in conference—and I did it both times on certain occasions—that the Senate conferees stand in disagreement on a particular issue and come to the floor of the Senate for instructions. I did so because I was convinced that we had reached such a point—particularly in view of the Dirksen resolution pending in the Senate—that the Senate as a whole should have been given an opportunity to pass judgment on some of these issues. As I shall point out later in my remarks instructions from the Senate would have been particularly useful in regard to one issue, because it was claimed that the language proposed by the majority of the Senate conferees in connection with situs picketing, for example, would be subject to a point of order in the House; and we were given assurances by the chairman of the House conferees, the distinguished Representative from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], that he would consider it his duty to raise such a point of order in the House.

I pointed out, after I had consulted the parliamentary authorities in the Senate, that under such circumstances, even if the point of order were well taken, it would not make the Senate impotent in the premises. We could have come back to the Senate for instructions, and we could have, in effect, laid aside for the time being further conference consideration until the Senate itself had passed what would have amounted to an independent amendment in regard to the building construction industry, particularly relative to situs picketing. Then we could have sent it to the floor of the House to let the House stand up and be counted as to the position it might wish to take with regard to this very troublesome issue, before we completed the conference work.

I so proposed, but I did not prevail. I say these things because I want the RECORD to show—newspaper column gossipers to the contrary notwithstanding—that the Senator from Oregon differed with the Senator from Massachusetts primarily upon procedures for conducting the conference during the last 2 or 3 days of the conference. We differed also, as our votes in the conference and our different individual final reports show, on the merits with respect to certain issues.

I make that introductory statement because I have been advised by a newspaper friend this morning—a correspondent, not a columnist, I may say good-naturedly—that there seems to be some question as to what the relationships between the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Oregon are at the present moment. I am sure the feeling is mutual, but at least so far as I am concerned the relationships are most friendly. They are based upon very sincere and honest differences of opinion as to the merits of the conference report.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In talking with members of the committee of conference on both sides of the aisle, it was my distinct impression that they were all very much impressed and pleased with the many contributions made by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon. They were very appreciative of the fact that he had at his command probably the greatest amount of knowledge concerning labor law, and that this was of great importance in the consideration of the two bills which were being considered by the conferees.

Mr. MORSE. It is very kind of the Senator from Montana to say that, but he was misinformed. The Senator from Oregon did not have at his command—and he wished many times he did have at his command—the legal propositions which he knew existed in the library, if he had had the time to get them, and which he felt would have been more helpful to the conferees if he could have obtained them. But it is the old situation: One cannot be in two places at once. After all, there is only so much time available, and one does the best he can.

But I appreciate the many, many courtesies which were extended to me by both sides of the table, Senate conferees and House conferees, Republicans as well as Democrats, because it developed rather early in the conference that the Senator from Oregon could not possibly sign the conference report. I so stated, for example, when the no-man's-land provision, which was adopted by the conferees, was placed in the bill. I taught constitutional law too long to walk out on my own teachings. I could not think of imposing, not merely on labor, but on the American people as a whole, the provisions of the no-man's-land section of the bill.

In my judgment, as I shall show—and I shall develop this matter in great detail during the afternoon—the no-man's-land issue alone is enough on which to base rejection of the conference report.

I am willing to say on the floor of the Senate today that, although at the present time I recognize that mine is a small minority voice in this country on this issue, in due course of time the position I take today on this issue will come to be recognized generally as a sound legal position.

I apologize to the Senator from Massachusetts for being unable to hand to him a carbon copy of all the parts of my remarks, but I should like to have my assistant on the floor proceed to deliver to the Senator from Massachusetts carbon copies of the various sections of the speech I am about to make which are available now. I do not know how many parts are available, because the speech was finished by me, so far as the first few sections are concerned, at about 2:15 o'clock this morning. I started to dictate again a little after 8 o'clock, and a part of my remarks is still in the typewriter and will be delivered from time to time as the speech proceeds.

Mr. President, it was with deep regret that I found it impossible to sign the conference report on the labor bill. There are many good features of the bill. In fact, many sections of the first six titles of the bill were taken directly from the Kennedy-Ervin bill, of which I was a cosponsor. It has been interesting to note that the mail which I have received urging me to support the Landrum-Griffin bill without change came from people who obviously did not know that the first six titles of the Landrum-Griffin bill are very similar to the first six titles of the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

As I shall point out later in this speech, the nationwide propaganda drive conducted against Congress for the adoption of the Landrum-Griffin bill came chiefly from antiunion inspired sources in the country who for a long time have been seeking to weaken or blunt or spike the economic weapons of trade unions. It is because the trade union movement has become effective in advancing the economic welfare of union members in our country that the antilabor forces back of the Landrum-Griffin bill have been so anxious to take advantage of the critical public reaction to labor abuses justifiably aroused by the McClellan committee. It is understandable that at such a time of widespread revulsion of feeling on the part of many people toward unions because of the shameful and inexcusable betrayal of trust on the part of a few crooked and corrupt labor leaders, antiunion forces in our country, spearheaded by such reactionary organizations as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Manufacturers Association, should wage a Madison Avenue propaganda campaign against unions. One of the results of this tragic setback of the rights of free labor in our country has been to separate true friends of the working people from their fair-weather friends. It has disclosed in the neighborhoods of America, within the business communities of the small and the big towns, within the legislative halls of our cities, States, and Nation, those who, in the name of one rationalization or another, are willing to sacrifice legitimate rights of labor at the altar of political expediency. Yes; when the history of this infamous legislative drive against the hard-earned rights of organized labor has been written, it will record the insincerity of many politicians who followed public clamor rather than tried to mold an intelligent public opinion and lead the public on the basis of the facts to the support of a just labor bill.

However, in my speech today I do not propose to try to fix blame for the sad legislative plight in which labor finds itself or for the political opportunism which motivates so much of the support for this proposed legislation. I am willing to leave those matters to the political reaction of the voters of the country after they have had sufficient time to reflect upon the demerits of this legislation. What I propose to do in this speech is to set out for the RECORD my major reasons for refusing to sign the conference report. I recognize that the conference report will be approved today by an overwhelming vote in the Senate. Political considerations are firmly in the saddle. Most Members of Congress will not take the time to analyze and study the complex abstract illegal implications and concrete economic injustices to labor of this proposed legislation. I shall vote against it because I am convinced that it is not in the public interest.

My mail, which has been voluminous on both the Kennedy-Ervin bill and the Landrum-Griffin bill, leaves no room for doubt that at the present moment a good political vote would be to vote for the conference report bill. However, I will leave that course of action for others who are interested in staying in the Senate even at the cost of sacrifice of principle or who are interested in moving on to higher office, no matter what the cost to labor's legitimate rights and to the long-time best public interest.

As for me, I expect to continue to receive a great deal of personal abuse and political opposition from the reactionary antilabor forces and from some honest and sincere people who justifiably resent the inexcusable abuses which have been practiced by some so-called labor leaders and who believe that the way to check those abuses is to pass this unfair piece of legislation. As to this latter group, I would be less than honest if I did not admit that their political declarations of war against me and their bitter personal criticisms set out in their mail make me feel very sad. No Senator enjoys casting a vote on proposed legislation which he knows is bound to cost him many votes at the ballot box, particularly if he is to stand for election in a State immediately following his Senate vote.

However, this political dilemma raises the old, old philosophical question in the field of political science, the answer to which Edmund Burke wrote to my complete satisfaction. As for me, when I come to vote in the Senate on any issue, it is my duty to follow where I think the facts lead, not where political considerations lead whenever the facts cannot be squared with the political advantages of the moment that might flow from a vote against the facts. If one is to follow the philosophy of Edmund Burke that an elected representative of the free people in a parliamentary body owes his constituents the primary obligation to exercise an honest independence of judgment on the merits of issues, in accordance with the facts as he finds them to be, then he must never be afraid to be defeated. He must never lose sight of the fact that it is not important that he or any other politician remain in office; but what is important, if democracy is to remain strong, and if the legislative processes of representative government are to go undefiled, is for each legislator to be true to himself and carry out his trust of voting on each issue in accordance with what he believes the facts show the public interest to be.

This does not mean that if each legislator does that, a legislative body will be unanimous on each vote cast. Sincere and honest differences of opinion on the merits of pieces of proposed legislation are bound to exist among sincere and honest legislators, and will lead them to reach different conclusions as to whether or not a given bill is in the public interest. As the debate on this measure proceeds, we shall see that demonstrated over and over again. But it is also true that, all too frequently, political expediency, political opportunism, compromise of principle, partisan politics, and fear of losing votes influence the votes in legislative halls. Whenever that happens, democratic government suffers and the voters are betrayed. If one is to follow the Burkean philosophy with respect to the principle that the primary obligation of a legislator is to vote on the merits of issues, irrespective of the political consequences, he not only must not be afraid to be defeated, but he also will find strength for standing by his convictions by taking succor from abiding faith that in a democracy, once the voters come to understand a legislator's reasons for voting contrary to an aroused public demand for a given piece of proposed legislation, such as the one now pending in the Senate, they will return their support to him, even though they may not agree with him in entirety.

On the other hand, if they do not find his reasons for his vote satisfactory, along with his overall record of representation in a legislative body, they should defeat him at the polls. That voter power is the essence of self-government. It is no disgrace to be defeated; but it is disgraceful to be afraid to be defeated, and, in an endeavor to avoid it, to follow a legislative course of action of political opportunism and expediency.

Because of the fact that I know that my opposition to the pending labor legislation is both unpopular and misunderstood among many people in my State, I intend to speak at some length today, for the RECORD, in setting forth my reasons for refusing to sign the conference report and for voting against it here in the Senate, as I probably shall have an opportunity to do before the day is over, or at least by the end of tomorrow.

Those very sincere people in my State who have written or telegraphed to me about my opposition to the Landrum-Griffin bill are entitled to have this official RECORD to refer to, in reaching a final judgment as to whether I have the political horns which they seem to think I have. It is my belief that many of this group of critics will come to modify their views concerning many of the features of the Landrum-Griffin bill, once they come to understand the harm that such legislation will do to the public interest.

Now just a word about the opposition's abuse that is pouring in from reactionary antilabor forces that would like nothing better than to reduce to economic impotence the free labor movement in the United States. I am pleased to have their opposition. I am glad to be judged by these enemies. Their stand on labor legislation has made their political thrusts inflict no deep wounds, and their extremism has no lasting effect on intelligent and thinking voters. I have received telegrams and letters from such extremists by the hundreds in recent weeks, and particularly during the days when the conference committee was in session.

A typical one came from a constituent by the name of Harold G. Cutright, 1000 Southwest Vista Avenue, Portland, Oreg., who apparently thought I might tremble in the political knees if he sent to me a copy of a telegram which he sent to Representative ROBERT GRIFFIN. His telegram to me reads as follows:

> This telegram sent ROBERT GRIFFIN: "Urge you fight to bring Landrum-Griffin bill before full Senate for vote. Don't let WAYNE MORSE lick you. MORSE is political dead duck Oregon. He knows it. He is playing labor's racket and seeking votes. He couldn't be elected dog catcher today in Oregon. Northwest people are behind you in your fight to rid labor racketeers, stop organization picketing, and put no man's land cases back in State courts. Keep up the good fight."

In recent days, I have received many such political love messages. I have replied to all of them in about the way I replied to Mr. Cutright. To him I said:

> I am sorry you feel as bitter toward me as you expressed yourself in your wire to Congressman GRIFFIN. I am perfectly willing to let the voters of Oregon judge my record of service to the State and to the Nation, including my votes on labor legislation when I will run for reelection in 1962. I will run for reelection on that record.
>
> By 1962, God willing, I will have given 18 years of legislative service to the people of Oregon in the U.S. Senate. During that entire period of time, my record will show that I have voted for the public interest as I honestly believed it to be in respect to each issue. I have done so by exercising an honest independence of judgment on the merits of issues in accordance with the facts as I have found them in my study of each issue. That voting record shows that I have voted against labor time and time again when the facts convinced me it was wrong on any issue, and I have voted for labor when I thought some legislative proposal sought to injure some legitimate labor right. I have followed the same course of action in connection with every legislative subject matter, no matter what economic group was involved.
> Political threats such as yours don't scare me because I don't scare easily.
>
> Sincerely,
> WAYNE MORSE.

Mr. President, I refused to sign the conference report, and I shall vote against the conference committee bill, for the following reasons:

First, in my opinion, a vote for the bill will be to liquidate some of the hard-earned legitimate rights of American free labor. Those rights have been won through long and bitter struggles in this country over the decades. It is regrettable that so many Americans, these days, are not familiar with the history of the American labor movement and the heroism of the pioneers in the union movement who won for labor the right to organize and bargain collectively and effectively with employers for improved wages, hours, and conditions of employment. These rights were long in their winning; and not a single one of them should be lost in a single legislative day, or ever. Part of the responsibility for losing some of them on this legislative day rests squarely on the shoulders of labor itself.

For some time past, organized labor has known that there have been within the house of labor some racketeers and crooks. Labor knew that the house of labor should not be used as a house of sanctuary and refuge for the few labor leaders who had betrayed their trust to the members of their unions, and have sought to escape both the responsibility for and the consequences of their improper conduct.

Organized labor has known for a long time that some union leaders have run their unions as totalitarian economic states, tolerating no opposition or no exercise of democratic rights on the part of the dues-tribute-paying members. It did not require the McClellan committee to disclose to organized labor the ugly fact that a few locals in some unions were ruled by business agents and officers who had shocking criminal records. The scandals of paper unions, the corruption of employer-shakedowns by which a union representative would threaten an employer with various types of illegal, coercive acts if he did not sign a union contract, even if it was well known that the union did not have any members, or, if it had any, had only a few members in the employer's plant, have been known for some time to exist in a few segments of organized labor. The denial of democratic procedures in running union meetings and union conventions, the failure to supply periodic financial reports to union members, the misuse of union funds, the abuse of trusteeship prerogatives, the destruction of perishable goods in secondary boycott cases, conflict of interest practices on the part of a few union officials, and all of the other union malpractices which have been disclosed by the McClellan committee did not come as surprising news to most of the leaders of the American labor movement. A sad fact is that the American labor movement should have cleaned its own house long ago. If it had done so, there would have been no need for the McClellan committee and the committee's disclosures of some corruption on the part of some unions and their officials would never have become necessary. The present agitated state of public opinion against organized labor in general would have never developed. Although a part of the responsibility for the present public demand for a legislative housecleaning of the labor movement must be assumed by organized labor itself because of its long delay in cleaning its own house, it does not follow that a destructive legislative bomb should be thrown into the house of labor in order to get rid of a few termites or to open the shutters so that the light of public disclosure can shine in. In fairness to the overwhelming majority of labor leaders in this country trusted with the obligation of serving as officials of international, national, and local unions, it should be said in their defense that there have been many obstacles placed in the way of their doing a better job of housecleaning than was being done until recently. It should be remembered many unions have enjoyed a complete autonomy and independence of any regulatory control in respect to any authority or jurisdiction over their affairs by any federation or organization composed of sister unions. The development of an organization such as now exists in the combined AFL–CIO amalgamation is of recent birth. Great credit is due George Meany and his associate officers of the AFL–CIO for their courage and labor statesmanship in respect to the housecleaning they have been doing within the structures of the affiliated unions that comprise their federation.

As we all know, in some instances they have thrown out corrupt unions which refused to comply with the ethical code of union practices adopted by the AFL–CIO. I think it is fitting that there be inserted at this point in my remarks a copy of that ethical code of union practices which was adopted by the AFL–CIO, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the code was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AFL–CIO CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES—AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

1. AFL–CIO CONSTITUTION ON ETHICAL PRACTICES

Article II, section 10: The objects and principles of this federation are:

* * * To protect the labor movement from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts of Communist agencies and all others who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and free and democratic unionism.

* * * * *

Article VIII, section 7: It is a basic principle of this federation that it must be and remain free from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts of Communist, Fascist, or other totalitarian agencies who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and of free and democratic trade unionism. The executive council, when requested to do so by the president or by any other member of the executive council, shall have the power to conduct an investigation, directly or through an appropriate standing or special committee appointed by the president, of any situation in which there is reason to believe that any affiliate is dominated, controlled, or substantially influenced in the conduct of its affairs by any corrupt influence, or that the policies or activities of any affiliate are consistently directed toward the advocacy, support, advancement, or achievement of the program or of the purposes of the Communist Party, any Fascist organization or other totalitarian movement. Upon the completion of such an investigation, including a hearing if requested, the executive council shall have the authority to make recommendations or give directions to the affiliate involved and shall have the further authority, upon a two-thirds vote, to suspend any affiliate found guilty of a violation of this section. Any action of the executive council under this section may be appealed to the convention, provided, however, that such action shall be effective when taken and shall remain in full force and effect pending any appeal.

Article XIII, section 1(d): The committee on ethical practices shall be vested with the duty and responsibility to assist the executive council in carrying out the constitutional determination of the federation to keep the federation free from any taint of corruption or communism, in accordance with the provisions of this constitution.

2. AFL-CIO RESOLUTION ON IMPLEMENTATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES

(Adopted by AFL–CIO convention, December 1957)

The agreement for the merger of the AFL and the CIO provided as one of the stated "principles of merger" that the merged federation "shall constitutionally affirm its determination to protect the American trade union movement from any and all corrupt influences. * * *" It also provided that "the merged federation shall establish appropriate internal machinery with authority effectively to implement this constitutional determination. * * *"

In accordance with this agreement, the constitution which the AFL–CIO adopted at its first constitutional convention in December 1955, contained both a statement of general principles with respect to communism and corrupt unionism and internal machinery to deal with this question. Article II, section 10, of the constitution provides that one of the objects and principles of the federation shall be "to protect the labor movement from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts of Communist agencies and all others who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and free and democratic unionism."

Article VIII, section 7, reiterated this statement of principle and provided that the executive council should have the power to conduct an investigation, either directly or through an appropriate committee, into any situation "in which there is reason to believe that any affiliate is dominated, controlled, or substantially influenced in the conduct of its affairs by any corrupt influence." The council was further given the authority "to make recommendations or give directions to the affiliate involved and shall have further authority, upon a two-thirds vote, to suspend any affiliate found guilty of a violation of this section."

The AFL–CIO constitution also provided for a committee on ethical practices which should, in the words of the constitution, "be vested with the duty and responsibility to assist the executive council in carrying out the constitutional determination of the federation to keep federation free from any taint of corruption or communism. * * *"

These constitutional provisions adopted unanimously by the founding convention of the AFL–CIO, established firmly that the AFL–CIO would assume the obligation of implementing the historical dedication of the American labor movement to free, honest and democratic trade unionism and its irrevocable opposition to corrupt influences in the labor movement.

The AFL–CIO constitution also reaffirmed the principle of national and international union autonomy which has historically been one of the cornerstones of the American labor movement. But, by its provisions with respect to corruption and communism, agreed to at the founding convention by all affiliates, the constitution made it clear that the rights of autonomy do not include the right of a corrupt or Communist-dominated union to remain in affiliation with the American labor movement.

By accepting the AFL–CIO constitution and joining with their fellow trade unionists in affiliation with the AFL–CIO, each national and international union in the AFL–CIO necessarily assumed the obligation to accept the principles above set forth. They are a part of the basic charter upon which this federation rests.

In addition to affirming its constitutional determination to keep the trade union movement free from corruption and communism, the founding convention of the AFL–CIO also adopted, by unanimous vote, a resolution on ethical practices. That resolution called upon "all affiliated national and international unions to take whatever steps are necessary within their own organizations to effect the policies and ethical standards set forth in the constitution of the AFL–CIO." It further called upon the affiliated unions to make such constitutional amendments or changes in internal procedures as might appear necessary to carry out the responsibility incumbent upon autonomous organizations under the principles established by the AFL–CIO constitution.

In the past 2 years the AFL–CIO has moved steadfastly forward to implement those basic documents. This has not been an easy or a pleasant task. It is never pleasant, in any family, to face up to the fact that a member of that family has violated basic principles of morality and good conscience. It is never easy to take action against members of a family who have transgressed.

The task of the AFL–CIO has been made particularly difficult by the fact that some of the disclosures of corruption within the family of the AFL–CIO were made by persons whose interest is not in strengthening labor by correcting corrupt practices, but in weakening labor by creating the impression that all labor is corrupt, that all unions must be restrained. Despite its recognition of that fact, the AFL–CIO is determined to keep its own house in order. Whenever facts are disclosed which indicate that there is a need for action to maintain and safeguard the AFL–CIO from corrupt influences, the AFL–CIO will act. Indeed, only by such action can the AFL–CIO defeat the purposes of those who would use the corruption of a few to weaken and place restrictions upon the successful operation of honest trade unions.

Let there be no mistake as to our purpose in proceeding against those unions which we have found to be false to their constitutional obligations. Our objective is not to punish. Our purpose is not to exile from the American trade union movement any group of union members. Our basic purpose is to achieve the correction of abuses and to help the members of unions with dishonest leadership.

To achieve this purpose the AFL–CIO executive council in the 2 years which have passed since our founding convention has initiated investigations into charges of corruption with respect to six national or international unions. Four of these investigations—those involving the Allied Industrial Workers, the Distillery Workers, the Laundry Workers, and the Bakery and Confectionery Workers—were initiated by the council prior to any hearings or disclosures by the McClellan committee. Two of the investigations—those involving the United Textile Workers and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters—were initiated following disclosures by the McClellan committee.

In none of these cases did the AFL–CIO executive council say to the union involved "You are corrupt and must be banished from the American labor movement." In each case the council asked the union involved, after it had been found to be substantially influenced by corrupt elements, to take affirmative action to clean its own house. Of the six unions, one—the Allied Industrial Workers of America—accepted in full the recommendations of the executive council and took action to eliminate completely the corrupt influences which the council had found. Today, as a result of its vigorous enforcement of the AFL–CIO's constitutional principles, the Allied Industrial Workers Union is an affiliate in good standing, with a new leadership which can proudly take its place in the family of labor and which can honestly represent the interests of its membership.

In other cases, such a result has not yet been effectuated. And in some cases it has been necessary to use the ultimate step of expulsion from the AFL–CIO when the union involved defied the executive council and refused to agree to initiate steps to clean its own house.

But even in those cases, the AFL–CIO has not yet finished its task. We are confident that in the areas of these unions the executive council will, pursuant to the authority vested in it, take all measures necessary or appropriate to safeguard the interests of the workers in the industry, to protect the good name and reputation of the AFL–CIO and to bring about the elimination of corrupt influences.

Nor can we be sure that there will not be further disclosures and the requirement for further action by the AFL–CIO. Should such action be necessary it will be taken in accordance with the same principles and with the same objective which has motivated the AFL–CIO, during the past 2 years: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the AFL–CIO reaffirms our firm dedication to the principles set forth in the AFL–CIO constitution and our determination to implement those constitutional principles without fear or favor.

We again call upon our national and international unions to take within their own organizations whatever steps are necessary to effectuate the policies and ethical standards embodied in the constitution of the AFL–CIO.

We pledge our full support and good offices to each affiliated national and international union which accepts this mandate and attempts to carry out and put into practice the principle that our "organization must be free from any taint of corruption or communism."

We call upon other segments of the community and other organizations to similarly dedicate themselves to the elimination of corruption. The labor movement will act in its own interest to clean its own house. In the national interest, we call upon business organizations, community groups, and others to similarly show their devotion to the basic ethical principles which must guide our American democracy.

3. AFL–CIO RESOLUTION ON ETHICAL PRACTICES CODE

(Adopted by AFL–CIO convention, December 1957)

The AFL–CIO, as one of its specific objectives, has a constitutional mandate "to protect the labor movement from any and all corrupt influences."

The committee on ethical practices has been vested by the AFL–CIO constitution the "duty and responsibility" to assist the executive council in its determination to keep the AFL–CIO "free from any taint of corruption."

The statement on ethical practices adopted unanimously by our first constitutional convention specifically called upon our affiliated national and international unions "to take whatever steps are necessary within their own organizations to effect the policies and ethical standards set forth in the constitution of the AFL–CIO." The same resolution pledged the "full support, good offices, and staff facilities" of the ethical practices committee to our affiliated national and international unions in "their efforts to carry out and put into practice the constitutional mandate" to keep our organization free of corruption.

At its June 1956 meeting the executive council directed the committee on ethical practices to develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences and directed that such recommended guides and principles be submitted to the council. Thereafter, and in accordance with this directive, the ethical practices committee developed six codes of ethical practices which were submitted to the executive council and adopted. These codes are set forth in full text in the executive council report, pages 77 to 94.

These codes were not and are not intended to be all-inclusive. Certain practices are so obviously incompatible with free and honest trade unionism that it is unnecessary to prescribe them in an ethical practices code. There is no code, for example, which provides that union officers should not steal money from their union treasury. This is so plainly an elementary requirement of honest trade unionism that it does not require statement in a code of ethical practices.

The fact that a specific action is not forbidden by the ethical practices codes does not establish that it is consistent with honest trade unionism. The codes are intended to be illustrative rather than all-inclusive in their scope.

Nor were these codes applied retroactively in the cases of the six unions to which investigations were conducted by the ethical practices committee into charges that they were dominated or substantially influenced by corrupt elements. In those cases, the question was not whether a code of ethical practices had been violated but whether the union involved was guilty of a violation of the provisions of the constitution of the AFL–CIO.

For the future, however, compliance with the terms of the ethical practices codes is, we believe, a minimum requirement for the conduct of honest and clean unionism. Such compliance will not guarantee freedom from corruption. Only the existence of a leadership truly dedicated to the principles of the trade union movement can provide such a guarantee. But the existence of specific illustrations, in the form of codes, of the minimum requirements for the conduct of clean and democratic unions will serve to strengthen the ability of the unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO to maintain the highest principles of ethical conduct: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the codes of ethical practices adopted by the executive council are hereby confirmed and adopted.

Each affiliate national and international union is called upon to take whatever steps are necessary within its own organization to comply with the provisions of the codes of ethical practices.

If any further codes are deemed by it to be required, the executive council is authorized and directed to continue its practice of adopting such codes to guide the unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO in their determination to maintain the principles of clean and democratic unionism.

4. AFL–CIO RESOLUTION ON FIFTH AMENDMENT CASES

(Adopted by AFL–CIO convention, December 1957)

The executive council adopted, on January 28, 1957, a statement with respect to the use of the fifth amendment by trade union officials. In that statement the council recognized "that any person is entitled, in the exercise of his individual conscience, to the protection afforded by the fifth amendment" and reaffirms the conviction "that this historical right must not be abridged." At the same time, the council declared that if, however, a trade union official "decides to invoke the fifth amendment for his personal protection and to avoid scrutiny * * * into alleged corruption on his part, he has no right to continue to hold office in his union." Otherwise, the council declared, an individual guilty of corruption would be able to use the fifth amendment not only as a personal protection against possible criminal punishment but as a shield against proper scrutiny into corrupt influences in the labor movement.

This statement of policy by the executive council has been misinterpreted by some as requiring "automatic" expulsion of any trade union leader who invokes the fifth amendment. It has been attacked by others as an attempt to wipe out the fifth amendment from the Constitution of the United States. Neither is true. Those who make such attacks either fail to understand the meaning of the executive council's statement or are attempting to defeat the proper inquiry by the trade union movement into the question of whether one of its officers is corrupt.

Every honest trade union should be concerned if serious charges of corruption and misuse of office for personal gain are made against its officers. The AFL–CIO constitution, indeed, commits each union affiliated with the AFL–CIO to take appropriate steps to keep the movement free of corrupt influences. That necessarily includes investigation by a trade union of one of its officials against whom serious and apparently well-founded charges of corruption are placed.

The fact that such charges are made before a legislative committee or other public agency and the union official invokes the fifth amendment, cannot give immunity to him from trade union investigation and appropriate action, if the investigation indicates this is required.

The executive council statement of January 28, 1957, made clear what was already implicit in the basic constitutional provisions and resolutions of the AFL–CIO—any trade union official against whom serious charges of corruption are leveled should be removed from office if those charges are true. If that official invokes the fifth amendment and refuses to state whether or not these charges are true, an investigation is required by the affiliate involved into the fitness of the official to continue to hold office. If it is found that the fifth amendment was in fact invoked as a shield to avoid discovery of corruption on his part, he has no right to continue to hold trade union office.

The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not confer immunity upon a union against its duty to determine whether an official who invokes that amendment is guilty of malfeasance in office. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not mean that the labor movement must see no evil or hear no evil merely because an individual union official, to avoid giving testimony which may send him to jail, refuses to answer questions before a public body: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved; That this convention affirms the principles herein above stated with respect to the duties of trade unions concerning officials who invoke the fifth amendment to conceal their personal corruption.

5. RESOLUTION ON PROCEDURES

(Adopted by AFL–CIO executive council, June 1956)

Whereas article II, section 10, and article VIII, section 7, of the AFL–CIO constitution provide that it is a basic principle of this Federation that it must be and remain free from any and all corrupt influences; and

Whereas article VIII, section 7, authorizes the executive council, upon the request of the president or any other member of the executive council, "to conduct an investigation directly or through an appropriate standing committee or special committee appointed by the president, of any situation in which there is reason to believe that any affiliate is dominated, controlled or substantially influenced in the conduct of its affairs by any corrupt influence * * *"; and

Whereas article XIII, section 1(d), provides for a committee on ethical practices which shall be vested with the duty and responsibility to assist the executive council in carrying out the above constitutional principles, and such committee has been appointed by the president with the approval of the executive council: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations:

1. That the committee on ethical practices is vested with the authority of the council to conduct formal investigations, including a hearing if requested, on behalf of the council, into any situation in which there is reason to believe an affiliate is dominated, controlled or substantially influenced in the conduct of its affairs by any corrupt influence and in which such formal investigation is requested by the president or any member of the executive council. The committee shall report to the executive council the results of any such investigation with such recommendations to the council as the committee deems appropriate.

2. The committee is authorized, upon its own motion or upon the request of the president, to make such preliminary inquiries as it deems appropriate in order to ascertain whether any situations exist which require formal investigation. The committee will report to the executive council as to any situations in which it believes that formal investigation is required or desirable and shall undertake such formal investigation as provided in paragraph 1 of this resolution.

3. The committee is directed to develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences. Upon the development of such recommended guides and principles, they shall be submitted by the committee to the executive council for appropriate action.

6. CODES

Ethical Practices Code 1: local union charters

(Approved by the AFL–CIO executive council, August 29, 1956)

The AFL–CIO, as one of its specific objectives, has a constitutional mandate "to protect labor movement from any and all corrupt influences."

The committee on ethical practices has been vested by the AFL–CIO constitution with the duty and responsibility to assist the executive council in its determination to keep the AFL–CIO "free from any taint or corruption."

As the statement on ethical practices adopted unanimously by our first constitutional convention pointed out, "The vast majority of labor union officials accept their responsibility and trust. Yet the reputations of the vast majority are imperiled by the dishonest, corrupt, unethical practices of the few who betray their trust and who look upon the trade union movement not as a brotherhood to serve the general welfare, but as a means to advance their own selfish purposes."

The statement of our constitutional convention specifically called upon our affiliated national and international unions "to take whatever steps are necessary within their own organizations to effect the policies and ethical standards set forth in the constitution of the AFL–CIO." The same resolution pledged the "full support, good offices, and staff facilities" of the ethical practices committee to our affiliated national and international unions in "their efforts to carry out and put into practice the constitutional mandate" to keep our organization free of corruption.

At its June 1956 meeting the executive council directed the committee on ethical practices "to develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences" and directed that such recommended guides and principles be submitted to the council.

In accordance with these constitutional responsibilities and mandates, the committee on ethical practices, in the period since its formal creation, undertook an analysis of the issuance of local union charters as it relates to the problem of corruption. The code recommended in this report is the first in a series which the committee plans to develop in accordance with the executive council's direction.

The committee found that in this area, as in the field of union welfare funds, the instances of corruption are relatively rare. The vast majority of local union charters are issued by the affiliated national and international unions of the AFL–CIO for legitimate trade union purposes and without any taint or possibility of corruption. In a few instances, however, local union charters have fallen in the hands of corrupt individuals who have used these charters for their own illicit purposes instead of legitimate trade union objectives.

The possession of charters covering paper locals has enabled such racketeers to victimize individual workers, employers and the general public, while giving a black eye to the labor movement. They have used these charters to enter into conspiracies with corrupt employers to prevent, for a price, the genuine organization of workers into legitimate unions, thus depriving these workers of the benefit of honest collective bargaining agreements. These racketeers also use a charter as a basis to falsely invoke the collective strength of the trade union movement for their illegitimate ends, thus demeaning the trade union's historic respect for the legitimate picket line, and injuring honest businessmen in the conduct of their affairs. A local union charter, improperly issued, can be used to control a local union unit vote, which negates the legitimate unit vote of bona fide local unions and thus subverts the democratic process within the trade union movement at various levels. A racketeer treats a charter as a hunting license to invade the jurisdictions of other national or international unions, in the interests only of corruption and dishonest gain, and to cloak with a respectable name a whole range of nefarious and corrupt activities.

Such corrupt practices are not widespread. But even the few instances in which local union charters have been corruptly used are too many. The name of the AFL–CIO, and of the national and international unions affiliated with it, must always be a hallmark of ethical trade union practices.

Scrupulous adherence, the committee believes, to certain traditional practices and principles of the trade union movement with reference to the issuance of local union charters will serve to prevent and to eliminate the specific evils in this area.

The basic principle with reference to the issuance of a local union charter is that the charter is, in all unions, a solemn instrument establishing a subordinate or affiliated body of the international union, composed of organized workers in a particular subdivision of the union. The committee has made a study of the practices and constitutions of a greater number of national and international unions with respect to the issuance of local union charters. In the vast majority of cases, the committee found, there is a constitutional prohibition against the issuance of charters in the absence of application by a minimum number of bona fide employees, eligible for membership in the union, within the jurisdiction covered by the charter.

The specific rules governing the issuance of charters necessarily vary greatly from union to union. And each national and international union, as part of its autonomous right, has complete authority to prescribe the particular procedures governing the issuance of local union charters. But whatever the particular procedures, each autonomous union has the duty to see to it that the purpose of issuing local union charters is to promote the general welfare of workers. The constitution of the AFL–CIO makes it clear that no affiliate has an autonomous right to permit corrupt or unethical practices which endanger the good name of the trade union movement.

The committee believes that implementation and enforcement of the basic principle that local union charters are to be issued only to give recognition to workers joining together in a subordinate or affiliated body of a national or international union, which is in fact expressed in the vast majority of union constitutions, will provide an effective method of preventing the kind of evils described in this statement.

Therefore, the ethical practices committee, under the authority vested in it by the constitution of the AFL–CIO and pursuant to the mandate of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO, recommends that the executive council of the AFL–CIO adopt the following policies to safeguard the good name of the AFL–CIO and its affiliated unions and to prevent any taint or possibility of corruption in the issuance of local union charters:

1. A local union charter, whether issued by the AFL–CIO or by a national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO, should be a solemn instrument establishing a subordinate or affiliated body. To assure this, the AFL–CIO and each national and international union, by constitution or administrative regulation, should require, for issuance of a local union charter, application by a group of bona fide employees, eligible for membership in the union, within the jurisdiction covered by the charter.

2. The purpose of issuing such charters should be to promote the general welfare of workers and to give recognition to their joining together in a subordinate or affiliated body.

3. A charter should never be issued to any person or persons who seek to use it as a "hunting license" for the improper invasion of the jurisdictions of other affiliated unions.

4. A charter should never be issued or permitted to continue in effect for a "paper local" not existing or functioning as a genuine local union of employees.

5. A charter should never be issued to persons who are known to traffic in local union charters for illicit or improper purposes.

6. The provision of the AFL–CIO constitution prohibiting the AFL–CIO and any affiliated national or international union from recognizing any subordinate organization that has been suspended or expelled by the AFL–CIO or any national or international union plainly includes and prohibits the issuance of a local union charter by the AFL–CIO or any affiliated national or international union to any group of individuals or any individuals suspended or expelled from the AFL–CIO or any affiliated national or international union for corruption or unethical practices.

7. The AFL–CIO and each national and international union shall take prompt action to eliminate any loopholes through which local union charters have been or can be issued or permitted to continue in effect contrary to these policies.

8. The AFL–CIO and each national and international union shall take prompt action to insure the forthwith withdrawal of local union charters which have been issued and are now outstanding in violation of these policies.

Ethical practices code II: health and welfare funds

(Approved by the AFL–CIO executive council, January 31, 1957)

At its June 1956 meeting the executive council directed the committee on ethical practices "to develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences" and directed that such recommended guides and principles be submitted to the council. In accordance with this direction, and its constitutional responsibilities, the committee on ethical practices submitted to the executive council at its August 1956 meeting the first of a proposed series of recommended codes. This code covering the issuance of local union charter was unanimously adopted by the council.

This report, and the recommended code contained in it, is the second in the series which the committee, in accordance with the council's direction, is developing to implement the constitutional mandate that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from any and all corrupt influences and the determination of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO that the reputations of the vast majority of labor union officials, who accept their responsibilities and trust, are "imperiled by the dishonest, corrupt, unethical practices of the few who betray their trust and who look upon the trade union movement not as a brotherhood to serve the general welfare, but as a means to advance their own selfish purposes."

Both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations prior to the merger of these two organizations into the AFL–CIO gave thorough consideration to the subject of health and welfare funds. This subject was also considered by and dealt with by the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO and a resolution dealing with this subject matter was adopted by that convention.

As stated in the resolution adopted by the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO, the task of administering and operating health and welfare programs which have been developed through collective bargaining has placed heavy new responsibilities upon the shoulders of trade union officials. The funds involved are paid for through the labor of the workers covered by the plans. They must be administered, therefore, as a high trust for the benefit only of those workers.

Most trade union officials have been faithful to the high trust which has been imposed upon them because of the development of health and welfare funds. The malfeasances of a few, however, have served to bring into disrepute not only the officials of the particular unions involved, but also the good name of the entire American labor movement. For this reason, it is imperative that the AFL–CIO and each of the national and international unions affiliated with it rigorously adhere to the highest ethical standards in dealing with the subject of health and welfare funds.

For these reasons, the ethical practices committee, under the authority vested in it by the constitution of the AFL–CIO and pursuant to the mandate of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO, recommends that the executive council of the AFL–CIO adopt the following policies to safeguard the good name of the AFL–CIO and its affiliated unions:

1. No union official who already receives full-time pay from his union shall receive fees or salaries of any kind from a fund established for the provision of a health, welfare, or retirement program. Where a salaried union official serves as employee representative or trustee in the administration of such programs, such service should be regarded as one of the functions expected to be performed by him in the normal course of his duties and not as an extra function requiring further compensation from the welfare fund.

2. No union official, employee, or other person acting as agent or representative of a union, who exercises responsibilities or influence in the administration of welfare programs or the placement of insurance contracts, should have any compromising personal ties, direct or indirect, with outside agencies such as insurance carriers, brokers, or consultants doing business with the welfare plan. Such ties cannot be reconciled with the duty of a union official to be guided solely by the best interests of the membership in any transactions with such agencies. Any union official found to have such ties to his own personal advantage or to have accepted fees, inducements, benefits, or favors of any kind from any such outside agency, should be removed. This principle, of course, does not prevent the existence of a relationship between a union officer or employee and an outside agency where (a) no substantial personal advantage is derived from the relationship; and (b) the outside agency is one in the management of which the union participates, as a union, for the benefit of its members.

3. Complete records of the financial operations of all welfare funds and programs should be maintained in accordance with the best accounting practice. Each such fund should be audited regularly by internal auditors. In addition, each such fund should be audited at least once each year, and preferably semiannually, by certified public or other independent accountants of unquestioned professional integrity, who should certify that the audits fully and comprehensively show the financial condition of the fund and the results of the operation of the fund.

4. All audit reports should be available to the membership of the union and the affected employees.

5. The trustees or administrators of welfare funds should make a full disclosure and report to the beneficiaries at least once each year. Such reports should set forth, in detail, the receipts and expenses of the fund; all salaries and fees paid by the fund, with a statement of the persons to whom paid; the amount paid and the service or purpose for which paid; a breakdown of insurance premium paid, if a commercial insurance carrier is involved, showing, insofar as possible, the premiums paid, dividends, commissions, claims paid, retentions and service charges; a statement of the person to whom any commissions or fees of any kind were paid; a financial statement on the part of the insuring or service agency, if an agency other than a commercial insurance carrier is employed; and a detailed account of the manner in which the reserves held by the fund are invested.

6. Where health and welfare benefits are provided through the use of a commercial insurance carrier, the carrier should be selected through competitive bids solicited from a substantial number of reliable companies, on the basis of the lowest net cost for the given benefits submitted by a responsible carrier, taking into consideration such factors as comparative retention rates, financial responsibility, facilities for and promptness in servicing claims, and the past record of the carrier, including its record in dealing with trade unions representing its employees.

The trustees of the fund should be required to include in reporting to the membership the specific reasons for the selection of the carrier finally chosen. The carrier should be required to warrant that no fee or other remuneration of any kind has been paid directly or indirectly to any representative of the parties in connection with the business of the fund.

7. Where a union or union trustees participate in the administration of the investment of welfare fund reserves, the union or its trustees should make every effort to prohibit the investment of welfare fund reserves in the business of any contributing employer, insurance carrier, or agency doing business with the fund, or in any enterprise in which any trustee, officer, or employee of the fund has a personal financial interest of such a nature as to be affected by the fund's investment or disinvestment.

(This is not to be construed as preventing investment in an enterprise in which a union official is engaged by virtue of his office, provided (i) no substantial personal advantage is derived from the relationship, and (ii) the concern or enterprise is one in the management of which the union participates for the benefit of its members.)

8. Where any trustee, agent, fiduciary, or employee of a health or welfare program is found to have received an unethical payment, the union should insist upon his removal and should take appropriate legal steps against both the party receiving and the party making the payment. Where health and welfare funds are negotiated or administered by local unions or by other organizations subordinate to or affiliated with a national or international union, provision should be made to give the national or international union the authority to audit such funds and to apply remedies where there is evidence of a violation of ethical standards.

9. Every welfare program should provide redress against the arbitrary or unjust denial of claims so as to afford the individual member prompt and effective relief where his claim for benefits has been improperly rejected. Every program should provide for the keeping of complete records of the claims experience so that a constant check can be maintained on the relationship between claims and premiums and dividends, and on the utilization of the various benefits.

10. The duty of policing and enforcing these standards is shared by every union member, as well as by local, national, and international officials. The best safeguard against abuses lies in the hands of a vigilant, informed, and active membership, jealous of their rights and interests in the operation of health and welfare programs, as well as any other trade union program. As a fundamental part of any approach to the problem of policing health and welfare funds, affiliated unions, through education, publicity, and discussion programs, should seek to develop the widest possible degree of active and informed interest in all phases of these programs on the part of the membership at large. International unions should, wherever possible, have expert advice available for the negotiation, establishment, and administration of health and welfare plans, and should provide training for union representatives in the techniques and standards of proper administration of welfare plans.

11. Where constitutional amendments or changes in internal administrative procedure are necessary to comply with the standards herein set forth, such amendments and changes should be undertaken at the earliest practicable time.

Ethical Practices Code III: Racketeers, crooks, Communists, and Fascists

(Approved by the AFL–CIO executive council, January 31, 1957)

This is the third in a series of recommended codes which the committee on ethical practices has developed in accordance with the direction of the executive council that it should develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences.

Article VIII, section 7 of the constitution of the AFL–CIO establishes that "it is a basic principle of this federation that it must be and remain free from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts a Communist, Fascist or other totalitarian agencies who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and of free and democratic trade unionism." Under this constitutional provision there is no room within the federation or any of its affiliated unions for any person in a position of leadership or responsibility who is a crook, a racketeer, a Communist or a Fascist. And it is the obligation of every union affiliated with the AFL–CIO to take appropriate steps to insure that this principle is complied with.

To be sure, neither the AFL–CIO nor its affiliated unions are law enforcing agencies. It is not within the purview or authority of a trade union to convict its members of a violation of statutory law. But it is the duty and responsibility of each national and international union affiliated with the federation to see to it that it is free of all corrupt, Communist or Fascist influences. Consequently, a trade union need not wait upon a criminal conviction to bar from office corrupt, Communist or Fascist influences. The responsibility of each union to see to it that it is free of such influences is not a responsibility placed upon our unions by law. It is a responsibility which rests upon our unions by the AFL–CIO constitution and by the moral principles that govern the trade union movement. Eternal vigilance in this area is the price of an honest democratic trade union movement.

It is not possible, nor is it desirable, to set down rigid rules to determine whether a particular individual in a position of responsibility or leadership in the trade union movement is a crook, a racketeer, a Communist, or a Fascist. Obviously, if a person has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude offensive to trade union morality, he should be barred from office or responsible position in the labor movement. Obviously also, a person commonly known to be a crook or a racketeer, should not enjoy immunity to prey upon the trade union movement because he has somehow managed to escape conviction. In the same manner, the fact that a person has refrained from formally becoming a member of the Communist Party or a Fascist organization should not permit him to hold or retain a position of responsibility or leadership in the trade union movement if, regardless of formal membership, he consistently supports or actively participates in the activities of the Communist Party or any Fascist or totalitarian organization.

In this area, as in all others, determinations must be made as a matter of commonsense and with due regard to the rights of the labor unions and the individuals involved.

On the basis of these considerations, the ethical practices committee, under the authority vested in it by the constitution of the AFL–CIO, pursuant to the mandate of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO, recommends that the executive council of the AFL–CIO adopt the following policies to safeguard the good name of the AFL–CIO and its affiliated unions:

1. The AFL–CIO and each of its affiliated unions should undertake the obligation, through appropriate constitutional or administrative measures and orderly procedures, to insure that no persons who constitute corrupt influences or practices or who represent or support Commnuist, Fascist, or totalitarian agencies should hold office of any kind in such trade unions or organizations.

2. No person should hold or retain office or appointed position in the AFL–CIO or any of its affiliated national or international unions or subordinate bodies thereof who has been convicted of any crime involving moral turpitude offensive to trade union morality.

3. No person should hold or retain office or appointed position in the AFL–CIO or any of its affiliated national or international unions or subordinate bodies thereof who is commonly known to be a crook or racketeer preying on the labor movement and its good name for corrupt purposes, whether or not previously convicted for such nefarious activities.

4. No person should hold or retain office or appointed position in the AFL–CIO or any of its affiliated national or international unions or subordinate bodies thereof who is a member, consistent supporter or who actively participates in the activities of the Communist Party or of any Fascist or other totalitarian organization which opposes the democratic principles to which our country and the American trade union movement are dedicated.

Ethical practices code IV: Investments and business interests of union officials

(Approved by the AFL–CIO executive council, January 31, 1957)

This is the fourth in a series of recommended codes which the committee on ethical practices has developed in accordance with the direction of the executive council that it should "develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences." Prior codes have dealt with the issuance of local union charters; welfare funds; racketeers, crooks, and Communists. The code herein recommended deals with conflicts of interest in the investment and business interests of union officials.

It is too plain for extended discussion that a basic ethical principle in the conduct of trade union affairs is that no responsible trade union official should have a personal financial interest which conflicts with the full performance of his fiduciary duties as a workers' representative.

Obviously an irreconcilable conflict of interest would be present if a trade union official, clothed with responsibility and discretion in conducting the representation of workers, simultaneously maintains a substantial interest in the profits of the employer of the workers whom he is charged with representing. Even though, in a particular instance, there may be no actual malfeasance in the representation of the employees involved, the opportunity for personal gain at the expense of the welfare of the employees whom the union official represents obviously exists.

Such a simple case, however, does not fully present the problems which exist, or may exist, in this area. There may be cases in which the conflict of interests is not so clear, but nevertheless exists. There are, on the other hand, forms of private investment which seem wholly devoid of any possibility of corruption or dereliction in trade union responsibility. It will be the purpose of this report to discuss some of the varying situations which may arise in this area and, on the basis of such discussion, to present a recommended code of minimum standards to which the committee believes all trade union officials should adhere in their investment and business interests.

The problems in this area, of course, could all be eliminated by adoption of the simple principle that no trade union official should, under any circumstances, use his own personal funds or property in any form of business enterprise or investment. But the committee feels that it is both unnecessary and unwise to establish such a rigid standard for trade union officials; union officers and agents should not be prohibited from investing their personal funds in their own way in the American free enterprise system so long as they are scrupulously careful to avoid any actual or potential conflict of interest. The American trade union movement does not accept the principle that either its members or its leaders should own no property. Both union leaders and members have the right to set aside their own personal reserves for themselves and their families, and to invest and use those reserves in legitimate ways.

But the trade union leader does have certain special responsibilities which he must assume and respect because he serves as a leader in the trade union movement. And those responsibilities, the committee believes, necessarily imply certain restraints upon his right to engage in personal investment, even with his own funds and on his own time. In a sense, a trade union official holds a position comparable to that of a public servant. Like a public servant, he has a high fiduciary duty not only to serve the members of his union honestly and faithfully, but also to avoid personal economic interest which may conflict or appear to conflict with the full performance of his responsibility to those whom he serves.

Like public servants, trade union leaders ought to be paid compensation commensurate with their services. But, like public servants, trade union leaders must accept certain limitations upon their private activities which result from the nature of their services. Indeed, the nature of the trade union movement and the responsibilities which necessarily must be accepted by its leaders, make the strictest standards with respect to any possible conflict of interest properly applicable.

It is plain, as already stated, that a responsible trade union official should not be the owner in whole or in part of a business enterprise with which his union bargains collectively on behalf of its employees. The conflict in such a case is clear.

It is almost equally clear, the committee believes, that a trade union official should not be the owner of a business enterprise which sells to, buys from, or in other ways deals, to any significant degree, with the enterprise with which he conducts collective bargaining. Again, the possibility that the trade union official may be given special favors or contracts by the employer in return for less than discharge of his obligations as a trade union leader, exists.

Somewhat different considerations, however, apply to the ownership, through purchase on the open market or other legitimate means, of pubicly traded securities. Employee ownership of stock is certainly a fairly common practice in American life. Often, indeed, there are special stock purchase plans designed to stimulate such employee investments.

On the other hand, ownership, even of publicly traded securities, in sufficient amounts to influence the course of management decision seems to the committee incompatible with the proper representation of the employees by a trade union official.

The committee believes, therefore, that the minimum standards of ethical conduct in this area should not forbid all investment by a trade union official in the corporate securities of companies employing the workers he represents. Such investment by a trade union official, however, should always be subject to the restriction that it is not acquired in an illegitimate or unethical manner, that it is limited to securities which are publicly traded, and that his interest should never be large enough so as to permit him to exercise any individual influence on the course of corporate decision.

There is nothing in the essential ethical principles of the trade union movement which should prevent a trade union official, at any level, from investing personal funds in the publicly traded securities of corporate enterprises unrelated to the industry or area in which the official has a particular trade union responsibility. Such securities offer a wide choice of investment and are, generally speaking, so far removed from individual stockholder control or influence that with the exceptions above noted, there is no reason to bar investment by trade union officials.

The same principles apply with respect to privately owned or closely held businesses which are completely unrelated to the industrial area in which the trade union leader serves.

On the basis of these considerations, the ethical practices committee, under the authority vested in it by the constitution of the AFL–CIO and pursuant to the mandate of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO, recommends that the executive council of the AFL–CIO adopt the following policies to safeguard the good name of the AFL–CIO and its affiliated unions:

1. No responsible trade union official should have a personal financial interest which conflicts with the full performance of his fiduciary duties as a workers' representative.

2. No responsible trade union official should own or have a substantial business interest in any business enterprise with which his union bargains collectively, or in any business enterprise which is in competition with any other business enterprise with which his union bargains collectively.

3. No responsible trade union official should own or have a substantial business interest in a business enterprise a substantial part of which consists of buying from, selling to, or otherwise dealing with the business enterprise with which his union bargains collectively.

4. The provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3 above do not apply in the case of an investment in the publicly traded securities of widely held corporations which investment does not constitute a substantial enough holding to affect or influence the course of corporate decision.

5. No responsible trade union official should accept kickbacks, under-the-table payments, gifts of other than nominal value, or any personal payment of any kind other than regular pay and benefits for work performed as an employee from an employer or business enterprise with which his union bargains collectively.

6. The policies herein set forth apply to: (a) all officers of the AFL–CIO and all officers of national and international unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO, (b) all elected or appointed staff representatives and business agents of such organizations, and (c) all officers of subordinate bodies of such organizations who have any degree of discretion or responsibility in the negotiation of collective bargaining agreements or their administration.

7. The principles herein set forth apply not only where investments are made by union officials, but also where third persons are used as blinds or covers to conceal the financial interests of union officials.

Ethical Practices Code V: Financial practices and proprietary activities of unions

(Approved by the AFL–CIO Executive Council, May 22, 1957)

This is the fifth in a series of recommended codes which the committee on ethical practices has developed in accordance with the direction of the executive council that it should "develop a set of principles and guides for adoption by the AFL–CIO in order to implement the constitutional determination that the AFL–CIO shall be and remain free from all corrupt influences." On August 29, 1956, the council approved a code dealing with the issuance of local union charters; on January 31, 1957, the executive council approved codes dealing with health and welfare funds, racketeering, crooks and Communists, and investment and business interests of union officials.

There are principles inherent in the conception of a free, honest, and democratic trade union movement, which, the committee believes, virtually dictate the outlines of any code of ethical practices dealing with union finances. The first of these principles hardly requires statement. It is simply that a labor union is an organization whose primary function is to improve the wages, hours and workin conditions of the employees it represents, through the processes of collective bargaining with employers. It is not a business enterprise or an investment company. Unions, of course, must have funds with which to operate and it is clearly desirable that they should maintain reserves to cover contingencies which may arise in the course of the performance of their functions as workers' representatives. But, equally clearly, the accumulation of funds per se is not the objective for which the union exists. A union is not a profit-making institution but a democratic organization with definite social aims and principles. Union funds are held in trust for the benefit of the membership. But a union, unlike a bank, a trustee, or other fiduciaries, is not primarily a manager of funds vested with the duty of enhancing their value and making distributions. Increasing the value of the union's funds should never become an objective of such magnitude that it in any way interferes with or obscures the basic function of the union, which is to devote its resources to representing its members, honestly and faithfully.

A second basic principle which dictates the terms of a code of ethical practices with respect to the handling of union funds is again simple. It is that unions are democratic organizations. The fact that a union is a democratic organization plainly implies that the members of the union are entitled to assurance that the union's funds, which are their funds, are not dissipated. They are also entitled to be reasonably informed as to how the funds of the organization are being used or invested. Finally, their delegated representatives in the union's governing body and conventions should have the power and responsibility to oversee the expenditure of the union's moneys so that the members can be guaranteed that funds are expended solely for the purposes for which the organization exists.

A final fundamental principle, the committee believes, is involved. That principle is that each national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO, in the words of the resolution on ethical practices which was unanimously adopted by the founding convention of the AFL–CIO in December 1955, "has clearly accepted the responsibility for keeping its own house in order and to protect the movement 'from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts of Communist agencies and all others who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and free and democratic unionism.'"

From these three basic principles, the committee believes that certain conclusions necessarily follow. Since a union holds its funds for the benefit of its membership and to further their interests it should comply with standards generally applicable to fiduciaries or trustees with respect to the manner in which it keeps its records and accounts. Regular audits should be made and there should be appropriate distribution of summaries of such audits so that the membership and the public are adequately apprised of the state of the organization's finances.

In this connection, a committee of secretary-treasurers of AFL–CIO affiliates has drawn up a suggested set of minimum accounting and financial controls for affiliates of the AFL–CIO. This set of controls represents, the committee believes, the minimum with which any affiliated organization should comply in order to fulfill the constitutional mandate that the labor movement should be kept free from any taint of corruption. Almost all unions, the committee believes, today comply with the minimum controls set forth in the recommendations of the secretary-treasurers. Many, indeed, have much stricter controls. The minimum controls suggested by the secretary-treasurers, therefore, should not be regarded as an optimum. Unions are to be commended and encouraged to establish and maintain even more stringent accounting and financial controls.

In addition to accounting and financial procedures necessary to conform to the controls applicable generally to well-run business organizations and fiduciaries, the committee believes that certain other rules follow from the basic principles set forth above. Because a union is a union, not a business organization or a trust company, the rules which guide its use and investment of funds are necessarily different. For example, investments by business organizations in other businesses from which they buy or sell, so that the investing business may get favored treatment in its sales or purchases, may be an acceptable business practice; similar investment by a labor union in business enterprises with which it bargains collectively presents serious problems. Such investment is not good practice for a union.

The fact that the basic objective in the management of trade union funds is not the maximizing of profit, but to further the objectives of the members' joining together in a union leads to additional conclusions.

A business organization has one function: to make money for its stockholders. A fiduciary's primary obligation is to preserve and, within limits defined by the necessity for safety, to augment the funds which the trustee is charged with holding for the benefit of the beneficiaries.

Since these are not a union's primary functions, a unions' investment policy may properly be governed by different considerations. For example, business institutions and corporate trustees might question today the propriety of investing all of their reserves in Government bonds because of their comparatively low yield. Yet, for a trade union, one of whose fundamental objects is "to protect and strengthen our democratic institutions," such an investment policy is to be commended. Similarly, since another object of a trade union is to aid and assist other unions and to promote the organization of the unorganized into unions of their own choosing loans and grants for mutual aid and assistance are part of the proud tradition of the labor movement even though foreign to the business community and not justified by any considerations of financial gain or even security.

Similarly, the business community may not regard it to be a bad business practice for a business enterprise to buy or sell from firms in which the officers of the business have a financial interest. Nor may the business community regard it as bad practice for a business organization to lend money, on adequate security, to members of the organization. Because the funds of a labor union are both held in trust for the benefit of its members and are held to further legitimate trade union purposes, practices which may be acceptable in business organizations, the committee believes, should be limited if not completely eliminated among labor organizations.

All of these considerations lead to this ultimate conclusion. With respect to accounting and financial controls and the expenditure of its funds for proprietary (housekeeping) functions the labor movement, it goes almost without saying, should follow the strictest rules applicable to all well-run institutions. With respect to the policies governing its financial and proprietary decisions, a higher obligation rests upon the trade union movement: to conduct its affairs and to expend and invest its funds, not for profit, but for the benefit of its membership and the great purposes for which they have joined together in the fraternity of the labor movement.

On the basis of these considerations the committee on ethical practices, under the authority vested in it by the constitution of the AFL–CIO and pursuant to the mandate of the first constitutional convention of the AFL–CIO and of the executive council, recommends that the executive council of the AFL–CIO adopt the following policies to safeguard the good name of the AFL–CIO and its affiliated unions:

1. The AFL–CIO and all affiliated national and international unions should comply with the minimum accounting and financial controls suggested by the committee of secretary-treasurers and approved by the executive council, which is annexed hereto.

2. The AFL–CIO and all affiliated national and international unions should conduct their proprietary functions, including all contracts for purchase or sale or for the rendition of housekeeping services, in accordance with the practices of well-run institutions, including the securing of competitive bids for all major contracts.

3. Neither the AFL–CIO nor any national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should permit any of its funds to be loaned, invested, or otherwise dealt with in a manner which inures to the personal profit or advantage of any officer, representative or employee of the union.

4. Neither the AFL–CIO nor any national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should enter into any contracts of purchase or sale or for the rendition of services which will inure to or result in the personal profit or advantage, including gifts of more than nominal value, other than his regular salary or compensation, of any officer, representative or employee of the union.

5. Neither the AFL–CIO nor any national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should invest in or make loans to any business enterprise with which it bargains collectively.

6. The provisions of paragraph 5 shall not be construed as prohibiting investment by unions in the publicly traded securities of widely held corporations which investment does not constitute a substantial enough holding to affect or influence the course of corporate decision, the provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 shall not be construed as applying to the profit that may result from a proper investment by a union officer, representative or employee. Nor shall such provisions be construed as preventing investment in a business or enterprise in which an official of an affiliate is engaged by virtue of his office, provided (a) no substantial personal advantage is derived from the relationship, and (b) the business or enterprise is one in the management of which the affiliate participates for the benefit of its members. The provisions of such paragraphs, however, shall apply wherever third persons are used as blinds or covers to conceal the personal profit or advantage of union officials.

7. Neither the AFL–CIO nor any national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should make personal loans to its officers, representatives, employees, or members, or members of their families, for the purpose of financing the private business or investment of such persons.

8. Each national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should promptly take whatever internal steps are needed to ensure that the standards set forth in this code are made applicable to itself and each of its locals and other subordinate or affiliated bodies. Wherever constitutional amendments or changes in internal administrative procedures are necessary to fully comply with these standards, such amendments and changes should be undertaken by the affiliates at the earliest practicable opportunity.

SUPPLEMENTAL CODE: MINIMUM ACCOUNTING AND FINANCIAL CONTROLS

(Drafted by special committee of union secretary-treasurers; approved by executive council, May 22, 1957)

A. Detailed and accurate records of accounts, in conformity with generally recognized and accepted principles of accounting, should be currently maintained by all affiliates of the AFL–CIO. These records should include, as a minimum need, a cash receipt record, a cash disbursements record, a general ledger, a dues or per capita tax record, an investment record, and a payroll record.

B. All receipts should be duly recorded and currently deposited. No disbursements of any nature should be made from undeposited cash receipts.

C. All expenditures should be approved by proper authority under constitutional provision and be recorded and supported by vouchers, providing an adequate description of the nature and purpose of the expenditure sufficient for a reasonable audit by internal and independent auditors. Disbursements should be made only by check, with the exception of disbursements from petty cash, in which situation, an imprest petty cash fund should be established.

D. Salaries of elected officials should be established only by constitutional provision. Compensation to nonsalaried elected officials, and to other officials, representatives and employees, if not fixed by constitutional provision, should be established and paid in strict conformity with such authority as is provided by the constitution and in accordance with its applicable provisions.

E. Reimbursement of expenses, including per diem expenses, should be made only where such expenses have been duly authorized and are supported in a manner that will permit a reasonable audit.

F. Every precaution should be taken to insure the soundness and safety of investments and that investments are made only by persons duly authorized to act for and on behalf of the affiliate. Investments in securities should either be restricted to the type of securities which legally qualify for trust fund investments in the domicile State or a person or persons authorized to invest funds of an affiliate should, in making such investment, be required to exercise the judgment and care under the circumstances then prevailing which men of prudence, discretion, and intelligence exercise in the management of their own affairs, not in regard to speculation but in regard to the permanent disposition of their funds, considering probable safety of their capital as well as probable income. No investment should be made by an affiliate in a business or enterprise in which any officer of that affiliate has a direct or indirect personal financial interest of such a nature as to be affected by the affiliate's investment or withdrawal of investment. (This last stated provision is not to be construed as preventing investment in a business or enterprise in which an official of an affiliate is engaged by virtue of his office, provided (a) no substantial personal advantage is derived from the relationship, and (b) the business or enterprise is one in the management of which the affiliate participates for the benefit of its members.) Securities owned by the affiliate should be under dual officer control and held by a bank or a trust company as agent or if that is not feasible, such securities should be placed in a safety deposit vault. All investments and legal title to all assets of an affiliate should be in the name of the affiliate or its duly designated agent or trustee.

G. Periodic, but not less than semi-annual detailed financial reports should be prepared in accordance with generally recognized and accepted standards of financial reporting. These reports should be prepared and submitted by the elected financial officer of the affiliate to the executive body of such affiliate for its study and such action as may be required.

H. A record of each meeting of the executive body of an affiliate should be made and maintained. These records should note all official actions taken by that body, in relation to accounting and financial matters.

I. Adequate fidelity bond coverage should be required by an affiliate for all officers, representatives and employees of that affiliate in positions of trust, including officers and employees of subordinate bodies of such affiliate.

J. Affiliates and their subordinate bodies should be subject to a system of internal audits made by auditors or by other competent persons in accordance with generally accepted standards of auditing so as to maintain current vigilance over all financial transactions.

K. At least annually, an audit of the accounts of each affiliate, except directly affiliated local unions of the AFL–CIO, should be made by independent certified public accountants. A summary of such audit approved by such independent certified public accountants should be made available to the membership of the affiliate and the public.

Each such affiliate should require, at least annually, that an audit be made of the accounts of its subordinate bodies by competent persons. A summary of such audit approved by such competent persons should be made available to the membership of such subordinate body.

An annual audit of the accounts of directly affiliated local unions should be made by authorized competent representatives of the AFL–CIO designated by the secretary-treasurer of the AFL–CIO. A summary of such audit, approved by such representative, shall be made available to the membership of such directly affiliated local unions.

L. All financial and accounting records of affiliates and their subordinate bodies, and all supporting vouchers and documents, or microfilm copies thereof, should be preserved for a period of time not less than that prescribed by applicable statutes of limitations.

M. Neither the AFL–CIO nor any national or international union affiliated with the AFL–CIO should make personal loans to its officers, representatives, employees, or members, or member of their families, for the purpose of financing the private business or investment of such persons.

N. No kickbacks or any other improper payments should be accepted or made, directly or indirectly, by any officer, representative or employee of an affiliate in connection with any financial transaction of such affiliate.

O. Affiliates should take every precaution necessary to insure their full compliance with all properly authorized and applicable requirements of State or Federal law pertaining to financial and accounting matters and to reporting.

P. In order to protect and safeguard the good name and reputation of the AFL–CIO and its affiliates, the financial and accounting controls set forth herein are made applicable to itself and each of the affiliates of the AFL-CIO and their subordinate bodies and to all their funds of whatever nature.

Q. Where constitutional amendments or changes in internal administrative procedure are necessary to a full compliance with the standards set forth herein, such amendments and changes should be undertaken by affiliates at the earliest practicable opportunity.

Ethical Practices Code VI: Union democratic processes

(Approved by the AFL–CIO executive council, May 23, 1957)

This is the sixth in a series of recommended codes developed by the AFL-CIO committee on ethical practices. The prior codes have dealt, primarily, with the questions related to corruption and conflicts of interest. The present code has been developed by the committee pursuant to the mandate contained in article II, sections 10 and 11, of the constitution of the AFL-CIO which sets forth the basic objectives of the federation to protect the labor movement not only from corrupt influences and Communist agencies but also from "all others who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and free and democratic unionism," and "to safeguard the democratic character of the labor movement."

These constitutional provisions of the AFL–CIO give effect to the democratic tradition upon which the entire labor movement is based. Freedom and democracy are the essential attributes of our movement. Labor organizations lacking these attributes, like Hitler's Labor Front. Franco's syndicates, and Moscow's captive unions, are unions in name only. Authoritarian control, whether from within the labor movement or imposed from without by government, is contrary to the spirit, the tradition and the principles which should always guide and govern our movement.

We are proud of our record. Just as the constitution of the AFL–CIO proclaims its dedication to the concepts of freedom and democracy and contains machinery for their implementation in the Federation's operations, so also do the constitutions of its affiliates. Almost without exception, they provide for the basic elements of union democracy: the right of full and equal participation by each member in the affairs and processes of union self-government, in accordance with the principles of representative democracy, and the necessity for protecting the rights of individual members.

The record of union democracy, like the record of our Nation's democracy, is not perfect. A few unions do not adequately, in their constitutions, provide for these basic elements of democratic practice. A few unions do not practice or implement the principles set forth in their constitutions. Finally, while the overwhelming majority of American unions both preach and practice the principles of democracy, in all too many instances the membership by apathy and indifferenec have forfeited their rights of union citizenship.

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have substantially frustrated previously successful efforts by unions to insure maximum attendance and participation by the membership in union meetings and affairs. The real corrective in this area is not so much the establishment of new principles as the exercise of rights presently recognized and accorded. Just as eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, so is the constant exercise of the rights of union citizenship the price of union democracy.

It is valuable, nevertheless, to restate the principles which should govern all free and democratic unions and to rededicate the labor movement to the preservation of these principles.

The committee on ethical practices has attempted to formulate in the following code the basic and elementary principles which any affiliated union should achieve if it is to comply with the basic principles and objects of the AFL–CIO constitution. Necessarily, since each union has grown up in its own tradition and with its own background, forms and procedures may differ widely. Unions should be free to determine their own governmental structure and to regulate their own affairs. But, whatever the form, the basic democratic rights set forth in the code should be guaranteed.

1. Each member of a union should have the right to full and free participation in union self-government. This should include the right (a) to vote periodically for his local and national officers, either directly by referendum vote or through delegate bodies, (b) to honest elections, (c) to stand for and to hold office, subject only to fair qualifications uniformly imposed, (d) to voice his views as to the method in which the union's affairs should be conducted.

2. Each member of a union should have the right to fair treatment in the application of union rules and law. The general principle applicable to union disciplinary procedures is that such procedures should contain all the elements of fair play. No particular formality is required. No lawyers need be used. The essential requirements of due process, however—notice, hearing, and judgment on the basis of the evidence—should be observed. A method of appeal to a higher body should be provided to ensure that judgment at the local level is not the result of prejudice or bias.

3. Each member of a union has the responsibility (a) fully to exercise his rights of union citizenship and (b) loyally to support his union. The right of an individual member to criticize the policies and personalities of his union officers does not include the right to undermine the union as an institution, to advocate dual unionism, to destroy or weaken the union as a collective bargaining agency, or to carry on slander and libel.

4. To safeguard the rights of the individual members and to safeguard its democratic character, the AFL–CIO and each affiliated national or international union should hold regular conventions at stated intervals, which should be not more than 4 years. The convention should be the supreme governing body of the union.

5. Officers of the AFL–CIO and of each affiliated national or international union should be elected, either by referendum vote or by the vote of delegate bodies. Whichever method is used, election should be free, fair and honest and adequate internal safeguards should be provided to ensure the achievement of that objective.

6. All general conventions of the AFL–CIO and of affiliated national or international unions should be open to the public, except for necessary executive sessions. Convention proceedings or an accurate summary thereof should be published and be available to the membership.

7. The appropriate officials of the union and such bodies which are given authority to govern a union's affairs between conventions should be elected, whether from the membership at large or by appropriate divisions, either by referendum vote or by the vote of delegate bodies. Such bodies shall abide by and enforce the provisions of the union's constitution and carry out the decisions of the convention.

8. Membership meetings of local unions should be held periodically with proper notice of time and place.

9. Elections of local union officers should be democratic, conducted either by referendum or by vote of a delegate body which is itself elected by referendum or at union meetings.

10. The term of office of all union officials should be stated in the organization's constitution or bylaws and should be for a reasonable period, not to exceed 4 years.

11. To ensure democratic, responsible, and honest administration of its locals and other subordinate bodies, the AFL–CIO and affiliated national and international unions should have the power to institute disciplinary and corrective proceedings with respect to local unions and other subordinate bodies, including the power to establish trusteeships where necessary. Such powers should be exercised sparingly and only in accordance with the provisions of the union's constitution, and autonomy should be restored promptly upon correction of the abuses requiring trusteeship.

12. Where constitutional amendments or changes in internal administrative procedures are necessary to comply with the standards herein set forth such amendments and changes should be undertaken at the earliest practicable time.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it is on the basis of that code and the failure of unions such as the Teamsters and others to comply with the ethical standards of the code that George Meany and his officer associates of the combined AFL–CIO had the courage to throw out unions which refused to comply; and I honor them for it.

I hope the day is not far distant when the rank and file membership of the Teamsters Union and the other unions that have been subjected to disciplinary action by the AFL–CIO will bring about the internal reforms necessary to establish democratic procedures and control in those unions, so that they can come back into the house of labor and sit as law-abiding units of that family, working shoulder to shoulder with organized labor in general to protect the legitimate rights of free working men and women in this country.

It should be remembered, too, Mr. President, one reason for the rather slow progress that has been made in the past with regard to a general union housecleaning, is that for the past 20 years—and, yes, in some respect prior to that time—the family of American unions has has been plagued with family quarrels, jurisdictional and otherwise, with the result that the house of labor has been divided much of the time. This has resulted in lack of discipline. Into such a state of internal union affairs, a few, but only a very few, relatively speaking, unworthy men have connived their way into positions of power in some unions. Their misconduct has reflected adversely on the entire labor movement, and today the entire labor movement is about to suffer the penalty of an unjust and excessive legislative sentence for the wrongdoings and bad practices of a relatively few bad men in the labor movement.

INNOCENT SHOULD NOT BE PUNISHED FOR CRIMES OF THE FEW

I shall be no party to punishing the innocent for the bad conduct of a few wrongdoers in the labor movement. One of the great strengths of the original Kennedy-Ervin bill, like the Kennedy-Ives bill before it, was to be found in the fact that it directed its legislative controls and penalties against the individual wrongdoer in the labor movement. It sought to avoid punishing the rank and file membership of a union for the wrongdoing of some official, particularly in view of the fact that the evidence brought out before both the McClellan committee and the Senate committee demonstated time and time again that seldom did the rank and file membership ever have any knowledge of the wrongdoing of corrupt leadership. The evidence shows that in most of those instances in which the rank and file suspected wrongdoing, the membership was immobilized from doing anything about it because they did not have available to them the democratic procedures essential to self-government within the union. Therefore, the Kennedy-Ervin bill sought to penalize the individual wrongdoer within the union. It sought to give the Secretary of Labor, with some appeal provisions from his decisions, the power to investigate and police unions charged with criminal wrongdoings or other violations of the law. Further, and very important, the Kennedy-Ervin bill sought to set up standards and requirements for the establishment of democratic procedures within the unions so that the principles of union self-government would prevail, in keeping with the American ideal of political and economic democratic rights for the individual.

In addition, the Kennedy-Ervin bill sought to make a few emergency, needed amendments to the Taft-Hartley law pending a much broader Taft-Hartley revision program that is expected to follow the completion of the work now being carried on by the so-called special blue ribbon committee appointed by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee to study and recommend Taft-Hartley amendments.

Mr. President, I want to make a comment about that blue ribbon committee.

First, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the public, management, and labor members of the Taft-Hartley revision committee, authorized and appointed by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, be incorporated in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, with a very brief biographical statement of the expert qualifications of each member of the committee.

There being no objection, the list and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think this is a fitting place for me to pay my compliments to the chairman of that so-called blue-ribbon Taft-Hartley revision committee, although I note in the last few minutes he has left the floor. He is the distinguished professor from the Harvard Law School in the field of labor law, Prof. Archibald Cox, who has served not only the chairman of our conference committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] really as a technical adviser throughout the conference proceeding but has served also, impartially and ably, each member of the conference, on both sides of the table, including, I will say, this one member who from time to time found himself in complete disagreement with Professor Cox. But that is no new thing for professors, Mr. President. One only has to attend a faculty meeting to find there is no unanimity of opinion, professionally or otherwise, among academic men and women.

We are fortunate, Mr. President, to have this very able and keen scholar from the Harvard Law School serve as chairman of this so-called blue-ribbon committee which has been put to work studying whatever need there is—and there is a considerable need—for revision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In fact, Mr. President, I took the position at one point in the conference, and, in fact, I had earlier taken it before we went to conference—that so far as I was concerned I was perfectly willing to agree to drop title VII entirely from the bill—title VII being the title which deals in effect with amendments to the Taft-Hartley law—and to await the recommendations of this group of experts, which I understand will come before the Congress at some date relatively early in the next session of Congress. I still think that was a pretty good suggestion, Mr. President, because I am of the opinion that we are going to have to replow some ground. Not only are we going to have to replow some ground, but we are going to have to cover up the weeds which are going to grow from the seeds we are planting today.

Mr. President, although I felt the amendments we offered to the Taft-Hartley law in the Kennedy-Ervin bill were in the nature of proved emergency needs, I would have much preferred and would have been perfectly willing to set aside even those until such time as the blue-ribbon committee reported.

Mr. President, one only has to sit for the hours we have sat with Professor Cox to know that the Senate has a very able public servant serving as chairman of that special committee, and I look forward with great interest to the recommendations he and his colleagues will present next year.

Before I turn to a discussion of titles I through VI of the conference report, Mr. President, I want to raise a rhetorical question and then proceed to answer it. What have we been aiming at as our primary purpose in the field of labor legislation in the Senate during these past 2 years? I thought we were aiming at putting on the lawbooks a labor reform bill which would deal primarily with procedures now found in some unions which do not give protection to democratic rights of rank-and-file members of those unions. I thought, Mr. President, that our primary concern was to adopt legislation aimed at democratizing those unions which are not now democratic unions. I thought we were seeking to express in law the right of the public to make clear to American trade unions that they are not any longer private lodges, but that they, too, are vested with a public interest, and that the public, acting through its lawmakers, has the right to pass legislation which will impose upon trade unions those reasonable but minimum restrictions necessary to protect the rank-and-file members of a union from corrupt leaders, or from abusive practices on the part of those leaders.

To be specific, the rank-and-file members of unions are entitled to protection from misappropriation of their funds. They are entitled to protection from any denial on the part of the hierarchy or oligarchy of any union in respect to exercising that precious right in a democracy of a secret ballot for the election of union officials of their own choosing. They are entitled to the democratic right of periodic union conventions designated by law, with control of those conventions through procedures which guarantee to the rank-and-file member a democratic right to determine who shall be the officers, what shall be the provisions of the constitution and bylaws, what use shall be made of the funds, what shall be the practices and policies, what shall be the economic practices as a trade union in relationship with management, and so on.

I thought that is what we were seeking to accomplish. As Senators will see, as I discuss titles I through VI of the conference report, that is what we sought to do in the Kennedy-Ervin bill. And I think a great job was done in the Kennedy-Ervin bill on this matter. I think it has been improved in many respects in the conference report.

When one makes objections to a conference report such as I make today, Mr. President, it is very easy to be represented as being entirely against the conference report. I am not. There are a great many parts of the conference report I regard as sound, and for which I voted and for which I argued in the committee, exactly as I voted for and argued for those same principles in the first six titles of the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

At the risk of a boring repetition of a tenet I have been heard to express many times in the debate in this body, I nevertheless want to state this basic tenet again for the RECORD, because I think many American people in this heated debate across the country have lost sight of the direct relationship between procedural and substantive rights. I think many people have not caught the significance of this very abstract but vitally important principle, Mr. President, so far as their substantive, concrete rights are concerned: such rights as one enjoys in connection with a legal controversy, or such economic rights as one enjoys in connection with any economic organization of which one is a member, or such substantive rights of any other type one enjoys as a member of any human institution, happen to be determined almost completely by the procedural rights one can enjoy as vehicles for carrying out, implementing, obtaining and effectuating those substantive rights. I could not cite a better concrete example than this problem of the labor legislation before the Senate today.

It is because I think this fact has been overlooked: because of the animosity that has been stirred up in this country against certain unions which have betrayed their trust to their membership, many people are saying in effect, "I don't care how you get it done. I don't care by what procedure you get it done, but, Senator, get it done."

I cannot agree, because I do care by what procedure we get it done. The procedure by which we get it done makes all the difference between government by law and government by capricious, arbitrary discretion of mere men. I care how we get it done procedurally, Mr. President, because in the long run it will determine whether it is a law that permits of the administration of justice to the people affected by the law or whether it is a law that permits of such injustices and unreasonable hardships in its administration. If it is the latter, it will plant in America, as I predict today we are planting on the floor of the Senate, a resentful determination on the part of millions of Americans to take issue with this law and subject this great Republic to more years of dissension, conflict, controversy, and militancy in the field of labor-employer economics. What we ought to be voting for today is a set of procedures which leave no room for question as to their fairness, as to their uniformity of application. We should be voting for fair procedures, to deal with abuses that the people of this country are entitled to have stamped out by law in the American labor movement.

Oh, Mr. President, I know that at such an hour as this a discussion of the legal principles which I have just mentioned will not be heeded by the extremists. However, I would be derelict in my duty if I did not write this record today. If I were to be asked the question, "What do you think is the worst thing about the bill?" I would say, "Its procedures."

I would say that because I believe, through these procedures, abuses will arise. I believe those abuses will force American labor, within the law, I hope, to exercise every power it has, as it has in the decades gone by, to fight it out on the economic line for the protection of decent wages, hours, and conditions of employment, and for the right to participate in democratic activities in the field of American politics. I say that because at every collective bargaining table today there is present also the issue of political legislative rights.

Let us not forget that by one sitting of a city council or a State legislature or the Congress, the passage of one bad law can wipe out for the time being hard-earned and precious economic rights of American free labor.

Mr. President, I know that the reactionary forces in this country want to make organized labor politically impotent. However, I am willing to say on the floor of the Senate today, in my judgment labor knows it has just begun to fight politically. The passage of this bill places upon labor the clear democratic duty of carrying this issue to the voting precincts of America for as many years as it takes to correct the injustices which I am convinced are imbedded in the conference report.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement concerning the comments of the Senator from Oregon on the question of fair procedures in legislation affecting labor and management.

I shall vote for the conference report. I shall vote for it because I believe many provisions of the pending conference report are needed; also because I think it represents the judgment of Congress. For 2 years now, this legislation has been worked on in the Committees on Labor, debated in the Congress, and finally has been reported by the conference. We have acted in the best way it has been possible for us to act.

I know that my friend from Oregon has said he will not vote for it. But I wish to compliment him for presenting a comprehensive record to the Senate and to the country which might not otherwise be presented, and for maintaining that however important the substance of legislation may be, proper procedure—fair procedures are necessary to protect the rights of our fellow countrymen.

Mr. President, I serve with the Senator from Oregon on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I can say for him that in our deliberations in executive session, which continued for 3 weeks, when questions of procedure arose the Senator from Oregon always spoke his concern that both substance and procedure should be fair, and that our legislation should preserve the rights of management and labor alike.

I recall that when we were discussing the titles which deal with the internal organization of unions—democratic procedure, including election procedures—the Senator from Oregon voted many times against positions which might be termed labor positions, as he voted against positions which might be termed management positions, always on the principle of whether they did preserve, under proper procedures, rights in carrying out what the committee considered to be the fundamental objectives of the bill.

Mr. President, in 1947, during one of my terms of service as a Member of the Senate, we debated and passed the Taft-Hartley Act. I remember very well the rancor and feeling which arose after the act was passed. I voted for the bill, and I remember the political pressures and the threats of political reprisal by some unions.

Now, in recent weeks curiously enough, that situation has been turned around. From my experience, I would say that the pressures and the talk of reprisal have come from the other side, not from all but from some sections of management.

I appreciate the position the Senator from Oregon is taking regarding reprisals. I like advice. I do not like, and am not moved by threats of reprisal. I agree that it is the duty of everyone of us to act upon these matters as they come before us, uninfluenced by threat of political reprisal. It may come. It usually does come in one form or another, but it is not something for us to take into account.

Returning to the question of procedure, I receive some messages, as do other Senators, to the effect that, "We want you to do this, and this only"—as though members of the Committee on Labor, and the Senate itself, do not have the duty of considering the way an objective should be framed in law.

When the labor bill came from the House, I received hundreds of letters saying, "This is what you must do. You must vote for the bill as it came from the House." The very fact that there was a conference which labored for days, and that the conferees changed both the Senate and House versions—adopting the great part of the first six titles of the Senate bill—is proof that the bill had to be improved, made fairer, and proper procedures evolved. It is a tribute to the conference that this was done.

As I have said, I differ with the Senator from Oregon, as I will vote for the bill. But in justice to the Senator from Oregon, and as a matter of fairness, I want to say that I am sympathetic with his effort to bring before the Senate and the Nation, many facts regarding the problem of labor legislation that may not be known. As he says, there are provisions in the bill beyond the original subject of labor reform, and which have little to do with the McClellan hearings, but which deal with substantive rights and problems of labor and management. Even if there had been no question of labor reform, those issues would require our attention, and would be difficult to solve.

And I congratulate the Senator from Oregon for bringing before this body again a most fundamental issue. It is that in legislative action the end does not justify unfair means. Procedures which protect rights—on both sides—are fundamental to our American system of justice.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator from Kentucky has just said. I feel sure that the remarks I am about to make will have the endorsement of the chairman of the conference and our mutual colleague on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], with respect to the contribution which the Senator from Kentucky has made as a member of our committee.

I hope I shall not embarrass the Senator from Kentucky by what I say; but I say it in the Senate today because I have said the same thing, in effect, many times in many places across America.

I want labor and management to know of my appraisal of the work of the Senator from Kentucky on the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. He has been a member of that committee with me on several occasions during our various committee tenures in the Senate, and we are colleagues on the committee now.

The Senator from Kentucky has the advantage of judicial experience. He is a very brilliant lawyer. Over and over and over again he has stressed the importance of fair procedure being written into legislation. I remember that this year, when the Kennedy bill was before the committee for consideration, there was considerable debate in the committee as to how far we should go in adding the appeal protections of the Administrative Procedures Act. Time and time again I found a very able ally in the Senator from Kentucky, in that he shared my view that if decisions affecting legal rights are to be made by administrators, such decisions should be subject to review in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedures Act. We differed in one or two instances because the Senator from Kentucky did not share my view that some particular administrative decision of the Secretary of Labor would affect legal rights; but whenever he felt that an administrative decision did affect legal rights, he joined in stressing the point of procedure about which I spoke a few minutes ago.

I have heard the Senator from Kentucky ask the question time and time again when we have been in debate in executive session of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, "What will be the effect on the public interest?" To me that is always the controlling question. Our votes in committee and on the floor of the Senate should always be determined by our honest judgment as to whether or not a particular proposal can be squared with the public interest.

The Senator from Kentucky has announced that he intends to vote for the conference report. I have no question about the sincerity of the convictions of the Senator from Kentucky in this connection.

So far as I am concerned, I wish to say to labor and management that when the Senator from Kentucky votes for the conference report today, it will be an honest vote by a sincere statesman who believes he is right on the merits of the issue, in accordance with the facts as he sees them.

I do not happen to share his valued judgment. I happen to believe that the defects in the bill far outweigh its merits. Therefore I shall vote against the conference report.

I hold the same view with regard to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] who has the burden of presenting the majority viewpoint on the bill. I disagree with him on some of his value judgments. I believe that so many defects have been left in the bill that I could not possibly vote for it, because I do not believe it is in the public interest.

Before I return to a discussion of titles 1 to 6, I wish to make these concluding remarks about the matter of procedure. I said I thought our main object was to enact labor reform legislation in this session of Congress which would guarantee the protection of democratic rights to rank-and-file union members. It has always been my opinion that if the proper procedures were established, the rank and file of labor would do a very effective job in eliminating abusive practices within individual unions. That is the kind of faith I have in fair procedure. I say most respectfully that in one sense we are putting the cart before the horse. At least we are not giving an opportunity to the labor unions first to clean house, unless we vest in the rank and file the democratic procedures and rights which we seek to give them by the first six titles of the bill.

Let us apply that statement to the Teamsters Union. I believe everyone knows that much of the difficulty in which organized labor is involved stems from the disclosures of the McClellan committee with respect to certain of the practices of the Teamsters Union. No one can condone them. But I believe that what we should do is to face up to the fact that one of the major reasons for the existence of such abuses is that the Teamsters Union is a nondemocratic, dictator-ridden union in many of its organizational segments. I think it will be found, as we study union abuses, that they exist when the procedures of any particular union permit of strong-arm methods and corrupt practices.

In fact, let us consider the abuses of the picket line, about which the McClellan committee has had so much to say. It will be interesting, I think, to analyze the picketing practices of democratic unions and compare them with the picketing practices of the dictatorially run unions. Provide the rank-and-file membership of a union with the procedural safeguards which give it a determining voice in the development of its union practices and it will be found that those fair-minded fellow citizens and neighbors of ours who are members of unions are good sportsmen, too; that they believe in fair play and will not support union practices which have led to the type of abuses we have seen manifested by dictatorially controlled unions. There is no better way to demonstrate those abstract procedural points I made a few minutes ago, if really effective control of abuses is sought to be provided, than to take a look at the procedures which make those abuses possible. If we could, as we sought to do in the Kennedy-Ervin bill, provide for union procedures which would give to the rank-and-file Teamsters greater control over the policies of their union, we would find that the abuses would disappear.

Mr. President, the demand has been: Adopt legislation which will put hooks into the Teamsters. Well, I am reluctant to carry out that mandate, because that mandate is based upon an implied proposal that we do not care how we should do it. I think it ought to be done by fair legislation. I have such a faith in government by law that I think it can be done by fair procedure. As the record shows, when a union is put back into the hands of its membership many of the abusive practices of those who theretofore controlled the union nondemocratically vanish, because the membership of those unions, by and large, are good citizens like the rest of us.

Who are they? I get so disturbed sometimes when I listen to antilabor propaganda which would leave one with the impression that if anybody even joins a union he or she is not a good citizen. Who are the union people? They are our neighbors. They are members of our churches. They send their children to the same Sunday schools. They sit with us in the same parent-teacher association meetings. They are our fellow citizens.

I do not propose today to support legislation which, in my judgment, does a great wrong to the overwhelming majority of good, law-abiding citizens who belong to the American labor movement. I am not interested in putting legislative hooks into crooks in the sense that it is suggested by many. I am not interested in adopting legislation which will provide unfair legislative restrictions upon legitimate practices of the free trade union movement. But I am interested in the passage of legislation which will provide the rank-and-file members of unions with democratic procedures, so that they themselves can eliminate, by union self-government, the crooks and the abuses which have arisen in some unions. That was what we sought to do, I thought, in the Kennedy-Ervin bill. In the first six titles of the conference committee bill, that matter was pursued.

By and large, I think the conference did a pretty good job; but I have these comments to make about that job, because I wish that some improvements could have been worked out.

TITLES I THROUGH VI OF THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE BILL

The first six titles of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosures Act of 1959, as approved by the joint Senate-House conference committee on September 2, 1959, deal with:

First. A so-called bill of rights of union members;

Second. Reporting by labor unions, union officers and employees, employers and labor relations consultants;

Third. Reports on trusteeships and regulation of the purposes and duration of trusteeships;

Fourth. Periodic election of union officers by secret ballot or by delegates chosen by secret ballot;

Fifth. So-called safeguards for labor organizations; and Sixth. Various miscellaneous matters.

These are the real anticorruption provisions of the bill.

Title VII of the bill has nothing whatsoever to do with the prevention of corrupt or undemocratic practices in unions or among employers and labor relations consultants. Instead, it contains far-reaching amendments of the jurisdiction, boycott and picketing provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which have long been desired by reactionary business interests in order to impose new restrictions on traditional rights and wholly legitimate practices of labor unions and labor union members.

While there are a number of provisions included in the first six titles of the bill which are not in satisfactory form and some of which are open to serious objection, the conference committee made substantial progress in these titles toward a reasonable and workable labor-management reporting and disclosure statute. Had the conference committee shown the same wisdom and judgment in dealing with the differences in title VII between the Senate bill and the House amendment as they showed in dealing with titles I through VI, the bill as reported by the conference to the Senate and the House would be a far better piece of proposed legislation.

I shall comment on some of the provisions of the conference committee bill which should, in my judgment, have received more careful consideration by the committee. Some of these provisions are seriously objectionable in the form in which they have been reported by the conference committee.

First. Section 101(a)(1) and section 101(a)(2) of the conference committee bill deal with equal rights and freedom of speech and assembly of union members. These sections contain limitations to insure the right and authority of unions to adopt reasonable rules to enable them to carry on their business, including the preservation of order at union meetings and requiring union members to be loyal and responsible to their union's performance of its legal or contractual obligations. Under these provisions, union officers can be sued by a union member who has been ejected from a meeting or who has been disciplined for leading a back-to-work movement in the midst of a strike if this officer's action does not appear to be reasonable in the circumstances to the court. Interference by force or violence or threats of force or violence with a member for exercising the rights prescribed by section 101(a)(1) or section 101(a)(2) would be a Federal crime under section 610 of the bill, subjecting the union or the officer responsible to a fine of up to $1,000 or a jail sentence of up to 1 year, or both.

These provisions are an unnecessary and unjustifiable intrusion by the Federal Government into matters which are presently handled by civil action in the State courts under existing law. There has been much talk about the need to require unions to conform to prescribed democratic procedures, but little concrete evidence has been offered in support of this alleged need. Provisions of the kind included in sections 101(a)(1) and 101(a)(2) of the conference committee bill need to be drafted with the utmost care if unions are not to be compelled to function under a virtual straitjacket of governmental rules and regulations.

Second. Under section 101(a)(4) of the conference committee bill, the rule of exhaustion of reasonable remedies within a union, taking into account all the circumstances which the courts presently consider in determining whether they ought to interfere in cases, would be supplanted by an inflexible 4-month period in which to exhaust "reasonable hearings procedure." It is obvious that reasonable men may differ as to what is a reasonable time in which to exhaust "reasonable" internal remedies, and this is indeed demonstrated by the fact that when the Senate and the House first considered this provision, the Senate prescribed a 6-months' time limit, whereas the House prescribed a 4-months' time limit. There has been no evidence at all that the rule of reasonableness with regard to exhaustion of internal remedies which is presently being applied by the courts is in any way unsatisfactory or ineffective in protecting union members' democratic rights and the conference committee ought to have left this matter to the sound discretion of the courts in the light of all the circumstances.

Third. Under section 101(a)(5) of the conference committee bill, a union member could literally demand "specific written charges," "a reasonable time to prepare his defense," and a "full and fair hearing" before being ruled out of order by the chairman and even by vote of the members at a union meeting.

Similarly, a union officer suspected of embezzlement of union funds or property, or the leader of a back-to-work movement during a strike, would also appear to have the legal right to demand the protection of these specific safeguards against summary disciplinary action by the union, even though such summary action may be specifically necessary to protect the union's funds or assets or to maintain its maximum bargaining power.

Fourth. Under section 102 of the conference committee bill, there is no requirement that a union member must exhaust his reasonable remedies within the union before bringing a court action under this section "for such relief as may be appropriate" in cases involving alleged infringement of rights preserved by the provisions of the so-called bill of rights. The absence of such a requirement would seem to make a virtual nullity of even the narrowly restricted principle of exhaustion of reasonable hearing procedure contained in section 101(a)(4) of the bill.

Fifth. Section 103 of the conference committee bill preserves the rights and remedies of union members under existing State and Federal laws. This provision has the effect of requiring unions to conform to possible conflicting State and Federal requirements with respect to guarantees of members rights and the conduct of internal union procedures which are within the scope of title I of the bill. If the internal affairs of unions are to be regulated at all, it would appear to be only proper to do so on the basis that since unions are entitled to the protection of the Federal statutes, they can properly be required to comply with certain Federal requirements, in return for such protection. This principle, however, can hardly justify permitting unions to be regulated under the laws of States which not only afford unions no protection whatsoever, but have on their statute books laws which are designed to interfere with union activities that are regarded as perfectly normal and legitimate in other States. If union members are to be protected by statute, all should be governed by Federal law, rather than by a multiplicity of varying, and often conflicting, State laws.

I digress for a moment, Mr. President, to return to the last point I made. Let me say that of the many tenets to which I hold as essential to the democratic way of life, one of the most important is the tenet of the uniform application of law to all citizens who find themselves in similar fact situations.

Mr. President, the authority of the Federal Government in connection with labor relations problems stems from the authority delegated by the constitutional fathers to the Federal Government under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, which will be found in article I, section 8. Because I shall refer to it so many times during the course of this speech, I ask unanimous consent that that part of the Constitution be printed at this point in the RECORD, as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the section referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 8. The Congress shall have power * * *

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the objection I have raised just now is based upon my belief that this section of the conference report is not going to lead to uniformity of justice; it is going to lead to great disparity of justice, because in some instances it will have the effect of delegating to the States certain authority, and the exercise of that authority will result in anything but uniform application of legal principles to what should be considered to be uniform legal rights.

I cannot vote for proposed legislation which violates that principle of uniformity. I shall discuss it at some length in connection with the no man's land issue; but I thought I should mention it at this point.

Sixth. Title II of the conference committee bill, which provides for reporting by labor organizations, union officers and employees, employers, and labor relations consultants, does not contain any exemption for small unions. Unions having fewer than 200 members and gross annual receipts of less than $20,000 could have been exempted from detailed reporting on their financial transactions in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, under the Kennedy-Ervin bill. Such a discretionary exemption was agreed to by Secretary James P. Mitchell last year, when the Kennedy-Ives bill was being debated by the Senate, and should be included in the legislation in order to prevent the bill from imposing undue burdens on small unions and their officers, where no need for compliance with the detailed financial reports requirement is shown. It is well known, I believe, that it is already difficult for these unions to obtain members who are competent and are willing to assume the responsibilities of union office. These difficulties will be increased immeasurably under the conference committee bill.

Seventh. Section 202(a)(6) of the conference committee bill requires officers and employees to report any payments of money or other things of value, "including reimbursed expenses" received by them, directly or indirectly, from an employer or any person who acts as a labor relations consultant to an employer, except payments of the kinds referred to in section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act, as amended. Failure by any such officer or employee to report any such payment is a criminal offense, punishable by a fine of up to $10,000, or imprisonment of up to 1 year, or both. Payments of the type described in section 202(a)(6) are also made criminal offenses under section 302(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, as amended. In these circumstances, section 202(a)(6) seems to me to be plainly unconstitutional, since it is an express violation of the protection against self-incrimination which is guaranteed to all citizens under the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I also have serious doubts, for the same reason, about the constitutionality of section 203(a)(1) of the conference committee bill, which requires employers to report payments to union officers and employees, which are made criminal offenses under section 302(a) of the Taft-Hartley Act, as amended.

Eighth. While the provisions for reports by employers and labor relations consultants contained in section 203 of the conference committee bill are subject to exemptions and exceptions that weaken the effectiveness of the reporting requirements applicable to employers and labor relations consultants, the provisions of this section are clearly preferable to those that were contained in the Landrum-Griffin bill. The conference committee was wise in retaining these broader and more effective reporting requirements for employers and labor relations consultants in the final legislation. The importance of including meaningful reporting by employers is emphasized when these requirements are compared with the reports on every detail of their organizing activities that may be required of even the smallest unions.

Ninth. Section 304 of the conference committee bill provides that any union member or subordinate body of a labor organization, as well as the Secretary of Labor, may bring a civil action in a Federal district court to prevent and restrain violations of the bill's provisions regulating the purposes and duration of trusteeships "and for such other relief as may be appropriate." Section 306 provides that when the Secretary files a complaint alleging violation of the trusteeship provisions, the jurisdiction of the district court over such trusteeship shall be exclusive. No such provision, however, applies to suits brought by individual union members of trusteed local unions pursuant to section 304. This does much more than simply preserve the rights of individual union members and local unions under existing law. The provision opens up avenue of forum shopping, which can lead to great uncertainty and confusion in the application of the trusteeship provisions of the bill.

Tenth. Section 401(c) of the conference committee bill provides that every bona fide candidate for union office shall have the right to inspect a list containing the names and last-known addresses of all members of the union who are subject to a collective bargaining agreement requiring membership in the union as a condition of employment. This requirement applies to all unions, including national and international unions, and even federations, like the AFL–CIO. Section 401(b) of the Kennedy-Ervin bill was, in my judgment, clearly preferable to this provision. Under the Kennedy-Ervin bill union officers would have been under a duty, enforcible by civil action in the Federal district courts, to comply with reasonable requests of candidates to distribute literature at the candidates' expense and to refrain from discrimination in favor of or against any candidate with respect to the use of membership lists in union election campaigns. The provisions of the conference committee bill may well lead to serious abuse, since they violate a cardinal principle that unions have traditionally observed, along with most other private membership organizations, namely, the secrecy of their membership lists as against outsiders. This principle is designed to withhold access to the list from unauthorized persons and groups; such as antiunion employers, the Communist Party and its supporters, commercial advertisers, and the like.

Mr. President, it is one of the great rights of secrecy that organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and many lodge groups have always insisted upon having the right to protect.

In some States, efforts of outsiders to obtain membership lists of the NAACP so that economic and social reprisals may be undertaken against individual members have led to considerable litigation. How important membership lists are in communities where antiunion attitudes prevail may be seen from the experience of the NAACP.

This is one of the most difficult points to get the general public to understand, Mr. President, because the general public does not fully appreciate some of the internal problems that confront a trade union.

These union lists have been carefully guarded and protected over the years.

There are many reasons for it. Instead of talking about union X or union Y, let us talk about a specific union. What do you suppose, Mr. President, the Machinists would be willing to pay for a list of the union members of the Automobile Workers in any locality where they have a jurisdictional dispute in process? What do you suppose, Mr. President, that antilabor employers would pay to get their hands on lists of memberships of unions while they are pondering the question, "Should we bargain or should we let them strike?"

Further, Mr. President, there must be kept in mind the psychological importance of these union lists to the members of the unions, because unions have learned, Mr. President, that employers would like to know how much strength they have, for example, in their membership, or how much economic power their membership might be able to bring to bear upon the employer in case of a strike. The size of a union would be somewhat determinative of a decision.

"But," say those who argue for making these union lists available, "in the case of union shops, to which this is going to apply, the employer knows who his workers are, anyway." That does not happen to be the case in every area where the employees are supplied under hiring hall arrangements, because under those agreements an employer has to take the workers as they are assigned to him by the union, in accordance with the provisions of the contract.

I have had much to do, Mr. President, with a coastwise hiring hall industry. I know how important it is to the maritime industry that its membership strength be kept a matter of its own secrecy.

Mr. President, we made some progress on this question in the conference committee. The language of the Landrum-Griffin bill in the first instance provided that candidates for union office would have the right to inspect and copy the union list. We finally succeeded in getting the provision for copying eliminated from the language, leaving in the provision for inspection.

But all an employer has to do, Mr. President, to get a pretty good idea of who is in the union is to get two or three employer stooges to run for each one of the union offices and give them the right to inspect the union list, and that employer would pretty soon have a fairly good idea, and an accurate idea, of who comprised the list, because candidate A for office would agree to look at the list from A to D, and candidate B would agree to take a look at the list from E to H, and so on down the alphabet.

In my judgment, Mr. President, if there is any merit in any protection of a union list, then the language of this bill destroys that protection.

Mr. President, the important thing is to provide for democratic procedures in the conduct of elections. The original Kennedy bill provided that the union was charged with the legal responsibility of seeing to it that the entire membership was fully informed in regard to the positions, the advocacy, and the literature of any candidate for union office. Mr. President, if the union did not carry out the mandate which was contained in the Kennedy bill, all that had to be done was for someone to make a complaint to the Secretary of Labor and to show that the union officers were not in fact carrying out that mandate, and the Secretary of Labor would have authority to set aside the election. That illustrates the procedural point I made a half hour ago. The important thing is to get the democratic procedure, and then to let the union run its own internal affairs in keeping with that democratic procedure, with the policing surveillance which the Kennedy bill, with respect to this matter and other matters, gave to the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. President, this is a completely unnecessary red flag to wave in the face of organized labor. Organized labor is going to bitterly resent this type of interference in its internal affairs. It is going to resent bitterly this attempt to get access to its membership lists, and we are going to find that instead of solving the problems we seek to solve by this provision, we are going to make matters much worse.

CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES

Mr. President, the conference committee bill omits the provisions which were contained in title V of the Kennedy-Ervin bill to encourage unions and employers to adopt or subscribe to voluntary codes of ethical practices and to establish the tripartite advisory committee to assist the Secretary of Labor in administering the act. By so doing, the bill is seriously undercutting the voluntary self-policing activities which the labor movement—though not, I want to say, the employers—has undertaken to rid its ranks of corrupt and undemocratic elements. These provisions were designed to encourage self-policing of their own affairs by labor and management to the end that Government regulation of their internal affairs may be kept to a minimum. The use of a tripartite advisory committee is especially desirable in connection with this legislation as it represents action in a new field. The omission of these provisions is a serious defect of the conference committee bill.

FIDUCIARY RESPONSIBILITY

Section 501 of the conference committee bill is one of the bill's most dangerous provisions. It contains provisions on the fiduciary responsibility of union officers, agents, shop stewards, and other representatives which not only hold these officials accountable for union funds and property in their custody or possession and for refraining from dealing with the union as an adverse party or from holding or acquiring pecuniary or personal interests which conflict with the interests of the union, but also may permit individual union members or groups of members to litigate the propriety of particular uses or expenditures of union funds and property. This arises from the fact that union officials in question are said to "occupy positions of trust in relation to such organization and its members as a group" and that it "is, therefore, the duty of each such person, taking into account the special problems and functions of a labor organization, to hold its money and property solely for the benefit of the organization and its members and to manage, invest, and expend the same in accordance with its constitution and bylaws and any resolutions of the governing bodies adopted thereunder." Under these provisions, it is possible that expenditures not strictly related to union organizing and bargaining activities, such as charitable and other contributions for social welfare purposes, and expenditures and contributions for educational or political activities of interest to labor could be challenged in any Federal district court or in any State court of competent jurisdiction. It is not at all clear that a general executive board resolution authorizing union officials to make certain expenditures would not be forbidden under the clause referring to "general exculpatory resolutions" contained in section 501(a).

I do not think anybody is being kidded. What do the antilabor forces want in this country? They want to get procedures into this bill so that some dissident element in the union, stooging for an employer, can cause trouble within the union when the union votes funds for political education purposes. That is what is involved here, Mr. President, and I am for meeting it head on. I have been assured that the fiduciary section will not prevent political contributions. I trust the courts will so interpret the language in the bill.

It is good for democracy in America for organized labor to take an active part in the democratic processes of politics. It is good for the vitality of democratic life in America that unions recognize the direct relationship between political policies advocated by candidates and their rights at the collective bargaining table. It is good for the democratic way of life in America that unions carry out their educational functions of disclosing to their membership the antilabor record of a politician who tries to talk out of both sides of his mouth.

It strengthens democracy in America to have the membership not only of unions but of farm organizations and of every other organization, including, yes, chambers of commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Medical Association, take an active interest in American politics.

If we give to the union the democratic procedures we are fighting for, the union member will have the right of free speech and he will have the right to try to change the point of view of the membership of the union. However, let us come to grips with the tough decision in this matter.

If a union is confronted with a political campaign in which it is perfectly obvious that a candidate is supporting measures which seek to destroy the legitimate rights of that union, why should not the union get into politics?

Mr. President, we do not strengthen democracy by discouraging democratic action. I have never been afraid of this matter. I believe there should be a full public disclosure of a union's political activities. That is why I have fought so hard, as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, for full public disclosure of the finances of a union and the uses to which every dollar may be put, or for which it may be spent.

I believe that the members of a union and the members of a community are entitled to know, before voting on election day, about the expenditures of a union and the concealed expenditures of chambers of commerce and various professional business organizations in support of a particular candidate.

Are we afraid of democracy? Are we afraid of our neighbors and fellow citizens who happen to belong to unions, to have the right in a union meeting to battle it out in regard to political issues and in support of a political educational program which seeks to bring to the people, prior to an election, the record of a politician?

I shall not vote for that kind of restriction on political rights in America. It would be a nice thing, if one were interested in an election, to try to keep on the statute books legislation which would restrict the activities of one's neighbors. However, that is not my conception of political freedom. I know what it means to be opposed by some segments of labor. In one of my campaigns a great, powerful union in this country did its best to defeat me. However, I did not take the position that it ought to be denied the right to participate in political activities.

I believe that our democracy will be strengthened when more organizations of free people play a greater part in political activity—business organizations, farm organizations, labor organizations, and, yes, Mr. President, in connection with some great moral issues which face the country, some church organizations. We do not make democracy strong by enacting legislation which restricts political activity.

I now wish to turn to another problem raised by the conference report, which it is very difficult to make the average layman understand, particularly in view of the propaganda that has been circulated in this country. I refer to the bonding provision in the conference report.

BONDING

I have serious doubts about the requirements for the bonding of union officers, agents, shop stewards, and other representatives and employees of labor unions, which are contained in the Conference Committee bill. The provisions, I am afraid, will be seriously burdensome for many unions, particularly some small unions whose financial operations are handled informally, albeit honestly. While there are some provisions of the bill with which I am in agreement, such as the provision barring the placing of a bond with a bonding company in which a union officer or employee is interested, it also seems to me to be entirely inappropriate and, in fact, discriminatory to apply criminal penalties against union officers who violate the bonding provisions, particularly when no Federal law requires even bank presidents to be bonded for the faithful observance of their financial responsibilities.

I invite attention to the language of the bonding provision, which troubles me. It is found on page 19 of the conference report:

SEC. 502. (a) Every officer, agent, shop steward, or other representative or employee of any labor organization (other than a labor organization whose property and annual financial receipts do not exceed $5,000 in value), or of a trust in which a labor organization is interested, who handles funds or other property thereof shall be bonded for the faithful discharge of his duties. The bond of each such person shall be fixed at the beginning of the organization's fiscal year and shall be in an amount not less than 10 per centum of the funds handled by him and his predecessor or predecessors, if any, during the preceding fiscal year, but in no case more than $500,000. If the labor organization or the trust in which a labor organization is interested does not have a preceding fiscal year, the amount of the bond shall be, in the case of a local labor organization, not less than $1,000, and in the case of any other labor organization or of a trust in which a labor organization is interested, not less than $10,000. Such bonds shall be individual or schedule in form, and shall have a corporate surety company as surety thereon. Any person who is not covered by such bonds shall not be permitted to receive, handle, disburse, or otherwise exercise custody or control of the funds or other property of a labor organization or of a trust in which a labor organization is interested. No such bond shall be placed through an agent or broker or with a surety company, in which any labor organization or any officer, agent, shop steward, or other representative of a labor organization has any direct or indirect interest. Such surety company shall be a corporate surety which holds a grant of authority from the Secretary of the Treasury under the Act of July 30, 1947 (6 U.S.C. 6–13), as an acceptable surety on Federal bonds.

During the conference I offered an amendment which would have changed one sentence so as to read:

Such bonds shall be individual or position schedule in form—

I was unsuccessful in my attempt to have my amendment adopted.

What was I seeking to do? I was seeking to prevent the laying down of a discriminatory rule against union officers that we do not apply to the officers of other organizations. I was taking the position that I thought what we were seeking to accomplish was to protect the rank and file member of the union in respect to the union's funds. That is what I thought we were after. I thought we were seeking a bonding provision which would guarantee to the rank and file member that the union funds had bonding protection.

Position bonding provides that an organization, whether it be a bank, a corporation, a trade union, or any other institution, may go to a bonding company and say, "We want a bond for our president, vice president, secretary and treasurer, and nine members of the board of directors," or any other officers they may have.

The bonding company sells them the bond. It is a bond for the office or position. It is a bond for the roster of officers in that organization. If the president of the organization dies tonight and the union, bank, or any other organization, elects a new president tomorrow, he is automatically covered under the position schedule. But the language of the conference report provides otherwise.

Interestingly enough, I point out that the language provides that—

Such surety company shall be a corporate surety which holds a grant of authority from the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of July 30, 1947 (6 U.S.C., 6–13), as an acceptable surety on Federal bonds.

That would automatically exclude Lloyds. It means that a union could not go to Lloyds and obtain a bond. I am advised—I think reliably—that in many instances there are substantial financial advantages in going to Lloyds. But there is no question about the fact that the funds of the members of the union would be protected under such a bond.

Why do we take the position in this bill that the union must go to a select group of surety companies and individually bond each officer, which costs more?

I objected to the provision in conference, because I thought it was an unreasonable reflection of a discriminatory nature upon unions, as contrasted with other organizations.

Individual bonding would not provide any greater protection to union funds. The same losses would be covered, if there were any losses. But I have another objection. I do not think it is fair. I think there is an implication here of suspicion—that we must have some special safeguard with regard to a union officer, which is not required in the case of a bank president or a member of the board of directors of some corporation. They are to be privileged to use position schedule bonding. I do not know why we single out labor unions and say, "You must have individual bonding."

That does not create any feeling on the part of the members of those unions that Congress might try to be impartial. It does not make them very happy from the standpoint of the additional costs. But I have a further objection. I know that when I say this some of the officials of the surety companies will be offended. But I am talking about it in the abstract. I will not vote to give this kind of authority to investigate individuals who are union officers to a private business. If there is to be investigating, let it be done through the Government. If it is proposed to have some requirement for the investigation of union officers, let the investigation be done through the FBI; let it be done through the Department of Justice. Labor has learned the hard way. It knows that it is not beyond the realm of possibility and probability that a very antilabor climate may develop in this country, in which, as we say in the colloquialism of the trade, so to speak labor will be "given the works." If a 2-inch headline should appear some morning: "Bonding Company X Refuses To Bond President Z of Y Union," that union will have been done irreparable damage in that area.

Mr. President, it is one thing for the Government to do the investigating; it is another thing to delegate by law to a private surety company the power to conduct that kind of investigation. Labor rightly resents this bonding provision. Labor is not taking the position it should not be required to put up a bond to protect its membership; it simply says it ought to be allowed, as other organizations are allowed, to select the type of schedule it wants, whether it is individual or position, and that it should not be restricted from entering into bonding relationships with Lloyd's. We do not tell American business concerns that they cannot enter into relationships with Lloyd's of London. But we do it to unions in this bill.

Mr. President, if one of the purposes of the bill is to help to create understanding and cooperation on the part of the rank and file members of Americans, then do not include in the bill this kind of reflection upon them. One more word on this point and I shall be through with this subject.

The report requires a position bond to protect the union membership, but then if a president, a vice president, or a secretary-treasurer of a union proves to be a crook, the individual bonding requirement will not help. The officer has the bond in the first place. The bonding company will have to pay the money, and the law enforcement authorities will have to proceed with the prosecution of the crook.

The issue as to the type of bond which is required in the bill has nothing to do with the responsibility of the law enforcement officers to see to it that when evidence relative to crooks in labor unions and the handling of membership funds is disclosed, they have the duty to proceed with the prosecution. I thought I had that point won once. I think my colleagues on the conference committee will bear out my statement that I did have it won for a few minutes. But then one of those corner caucuses took place, and the members came back and said, "No, there has been so much smoke about the matter of malfeasance in office with regard to the financial affairs of unions that we cannot yield on this point." Well, I think time will prove that they made a great mistake in not yielding.

What is also needed in America is to do those things which will try to reduce to a minimum the causes of irritation between unions and employers. We can never get away from the fact that American labor generally will hold to the point of view, and rightly so, that antilabor employers in this country were very instrumental in the development of the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill. It is such things as the bonding requirement in this part of the bill which will incense the individual union member and will cause him to say and to feel that the bill is not fair. Congress says in one breath that it is trying to protect the funds of the union for the individual rank-and-file member, and that could be done by position bonding; and then it proceeds to require individual bonding, which places a private company in a position to do great damage to a union by the denial of a bond to an officer when that officer will automatically be covered in a position bond.

DISQUALIFICATION OF OFFICERS

Section 504 of the conference committee bill disqualifies Communists and persons who have been Communists or have been convicted, or served any part of a prison term as a result of conviction for certain specified major crimes from holding office or employment—other than in a purely clerical or custodial capacity—in a union or in a group or association of employees dealing with a union as a labor relations consultant for 5 years after the termination of such person's membership in the Communist Party or for 5 years after such conviction or imprisonment. The disqualification of former convicts may be lifted, however, if the citizenship rights of the individual in question, having been revoked as a result of his conviction, have been fully restored or if the Board of Parole of the U.S. Department of Justice determines that his service or employment would not be contrary to the purpose of the act. I have serious doubts as to whether these provisions are constitutional, workable and effective.

Section 505 of the Conference Committee bill amends section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act. These amendments are generally the same as are contained in section 211 of the Kennedy-Ervin bill as passed by the Senate. The conference committee bill omits, however, the provision which is contained in the Kennedy-Ervin bill authorizing the checkoff of periodic payments in lieu of membership dues under so-called agency shops.

PRESERVATION OF STATE LAWS

Section 603 of the conference committee bill provides that the responsibilities of unions and of officers, agents, shop stewards and other representatives of a union or of any trust in which the union is interested, under other Federal or State laws, are not reduced or limited by anything contained in the bill except as explicitly provided to the contrary, and that the rights and remedies of union members under other Federal or State laws are not to be taken away or barred except as specifically provided to the contrary. This is a "States rights" provision which flies in the face of traditional concepts in the field of national labor relations policy and law and has no place in legislation which is designed to remedy, through Federal law, deficiencies in State law enforcement which have been largely responsible for allowing crooks and racketeers to work their way into the labor and management fields.

In fact, Mr. President, in regard to the so-called States' rights argument, it should be said that the States have a great deal to answer for, because of the fact that they have not enforced their own criminal laws against the racketeers and the crooks. They have been inclined to "pass the buck" to the Federal Government. They "want it both ways."

CRIMINAL THREAT OF FORCE

Mr. President, section 610 of the conference committee bill would make it a Federal crime to use force or the threat of force to prevent a member, by intimidation, from exercising rights to which he is entitled under the bill. A similar provision was included in section 607(b) of the Kennedy-Ervin bill, as passed by the Senate. The Kennedy-Ervin bill, however, prohibited economic reprisal, as well as the use of force or the threat of force, and imposed substantially heavier penalties for violations than does the conference committee bill. Generally speaking, the effect of these provisions is to make assault and battery a Federal crime, but only when it occurs in a union. I have already referred above to the inappropriateness of provisions of this type for the enforcement of the rights of union members.

Mr. President, I regret that these shortcomings of the bill, in regard to this section, were not remedied before the bill was brought to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, that is my summary of my views on the first six titles of the bill.

I turn now to the even more controversial title VII of the bill; and first I shall proceed with a discussion of the so-called no-man's land issue.

NO MAN'S LAND

The conference report solved the no man's land jurisdictional issue by permitting the Board to refuse jurisdiction over cases which involve an insufficient effect upon commerce. The Board's discretion is pegged so as not to refuse cases which it would assert jurisdiction over, under its standards of August 1, 1959. For labor disputes involving employers and unions below the Board's standards, the conference bill would allow State agencies and State courts to exercise jurisdiction. Of the 50 States, 38 have no administrative agencies whatsoever, hence, in these States, labor disputes will be handled by State courts. Since the common law did not develop a body of laws guaranteeing employees the right to join a labor organization, the employees of small employers in these States, and the rights of small unions, amount to nothing. Rights of employers in these States, on the other hand, are fully protected by virtue of a climate of antipathy against labor organizations, and a long series of legal concepts which severely restrict strikes and picketing. It was, indeed, because of the abuse of these common law holdings that the Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed in 1932 to apply in the Federal courts; hence, it may be a source of satisfaction to small employers to avail themselves of the rights and remedies furnished by State court injunctions; but the conference bill completely ignores the rights of employees of those employers, and the many small labor organizations which in the past 5 years have operated with comparative freedom from State court injunctions.

In the 12 States having State labor agencies, only a few of them function effectively and fairly; hence, it would be a fair statement to say that, except for 5 or 6 States of the now 50, the rights of employees employed by small employers and weak unions are not protected.

Against the conference solution to the no man's land, the Senate passed version would have preserved the rights of employees, as well as small employers. The Senate bill would have required State agencies to administer Federal law over labor disputes which the Board could not properly exercise its jurisdiction. During the conference, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] submitted an amendment which would have been far fairer than the Conference bill, even thought it did not accept completely some of the provisions of the Senate passed bill. The principal provisions of the Prouty amendment would have required the State courts or the State agencies, if there were any, to apply the unfair labor practices sections of the Federal law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed Prouty amendment be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 701 (a) Section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby designated as section 6(a) and said section 6 is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection (b):

"(b)(1) The Board in its discretion may, by rule or otherwise, decline to take jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding if, in the Board's judgment, the effect thereof on commerce is insufficient to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction.

"Within thirty days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Board shall clearly establish and publish by rule or otherwise such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it proposes to observe for the purpose of excluding from its jurisdiction any labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding: Provided: That such limitations shall be substantially in accord with those in effect on August 15, 1959.

"(2) The Board in the same manner may establish and publish modifications of such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it has established pursuant to paragraph (1), but no such modification shall have the effect of staying or otherwise affecting any proceding duly instituted before any appropriate court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands) prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification; nor shall any such modification permit the Board to withdraw exercise of its jurisdiction over any proceeding which has been duly instituted before the Board prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification.

"(3) Any person may petition the Board for a determination as to whether a particular case involving a labor dispute falls within the limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction established pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2). Notice of such petition and its contents shall be given contemporaneously by the petitioner to any known interested persons or his representative, and such notice shall have the effect of staying any proceeding to which the petition refers explicitly, and to which both petitioner and any person or persons given such notice are the parties. Any person given notice may file an answer with the Board not later than ten days after receiving such notice. The Board's determination, unless arbitrary, shall be final and binding upon the petitioner and upon all parties notified by petitioner as provided in this paragraph. If the Board shall make no determination within thirty days after the filing of the initial petition, it shall be presumed that the Board has determined to be outside its jurisdiction any case to which the petition explicitly refers, and to which petitioner and any person or persons given appropriate notice are the parties."

(c) Section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c)(1) Whenever the Board has declined jurisdiction over an unfair labor practice, the courts of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands) shall have jurisdiction over such unfair labor practices: Provided, That any State or Territory may, by legislation or otherwise, provide that an agency rather than the courts thereof shall assume and assert such jurisdiction.

"(2) Whenever the Board has declined jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) may, by legislation or otherwise, establish an agency to assert jurisdiction over such labor dispute, unfair labor practice, or representation proceeding and such agency shall not be precluded from asserting jurisdiction by virtue of the fact that such labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding affects interstate commerce.

"(3) In determining unfair labor practice proceedings being presented in accordance with paragraph (1) of this subsection, or in determining labor disputes, unfair labor practices, or representation proceedings pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the State or Territorial court or agency shall apply and be governed solely by Federal law as set forth in section 8 and section 9, as the case may be, and Board and Federal court rules of decision construing said facts.

"(4) Whenever any State or Territory establishes pursuant to this section an agency to assume and assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute, unfair labor practice or representation proceeding which the Board has excluded from its exercise of jurisdiction pursuant to section 6(b) of this Act, the courts of such States or Territories shall no longer assume or assert jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection except for cases then pending in such courts which may be concluded and determined by them.

"(5) Proceedings brought in a State or Territorial court pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be advanced on the docket and expedited for disposition. Such proceedings shall not be subject to removal to the Federal courts under the provisions of the Judicial Code (Act of June 25 1948; 28 U.S.C.) as amended.

"(6) Decisions of an agency or court of a State or Territory shall be reviewed in State and Territorial courts according to the State or Territorial law relating to practices and procedure.

"(7) Judgments or decrees of the State or Territorial courts shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari as provided in the Judicial Code, as amended (Act of June 25, 1948; 28 U.S.C.)."

(d) Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by repealing the proviso thereto.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have said, I believe, on the floor of the Senate—and certainly I said it in the conference—that, in my judgment, the Prouty amendment was the most ably drafted, from a legal standpoint, of any of the amendments the conference committee dealt with; and I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] deserves high commendation for what I thought was a very, very fair compromise of this very serious situation.

In this way, at least employees of small employers, as well as large ones, would have been guaranteed the right to self-organization, "to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing" (sec. 7 of the National Labor Relations Act); and they would have been guaranteed that, because the Prouty amendment would have required the State courts to follow Federal law. The only jurisdiction that the Federal Government has over national labor relations cases is under the interstate commerce clause. But in connection with this matter, the conference report really will authorize a Federal "right to work" law in reverse; it will put workers in interstate commerce plants at the mercy of State courts, in regard to which there is anything but uniformity in the administration of labor relations justice.

Does it make any difference to the individual, regardless of whether he works in a small plant over which the National Labor Relations Board has decided not to take jurisdiction or whether he works in an automobile plant in Detroit, when it comes to the question of protecting his interstate rights? Since when is it compatible with our concept of American justice that we can give one interpretation of constitutional rights under the interstate commerce clause to workers in a small plant, and a different interpretation to workers in a large plant, who are protected by Federal law? It shocks me.

As I said in committee, and I have no hesitancy in saying it here, there is nothing anyone could do to get me to sign this conference report if the only imperfection in it was this gross injustice contained in the provision in regard to no man's land cases.

Why, surely, I am within the rules when I say there are sections of this country in which State courts are known, by way of the record they have made, to be grossly antilabor. There are sections of this country, Mr. President, in which the opposition to organizational activity on the part of State courts has manifested itself time and time again in arbitrary ex parte injunctions—judicial records that have caused the United States Supreme Court in instance after instance to reverse them.

Well, you gentlemen can take it home and explain to your own constituents. I am glad I do not have your job, because I shall explain to my constituents, as I have explained on the Senate floor today, that I kept faith with what I considered to be one of the most cardinal principles of American justice—that there should be a uniform application of constitutional rights to American citizens, irrespective of the State in which they live. It is just that simple.

Sometimes do you know what I think, Mr. President? I think we have difficulty in getting acceptance of principles, such as the one for which I am pleading this afternoon, just because they make common sense. Sometimes I think if we really want to get something adopted here in the Congress of the United States we had better make sure it does not make common sense, because there is no common sense in this no man's land provision of the conference report. It is discriminatory, unfairly so, with respect to the interstate commerce rights of fellow Americans, determined by the size of a plan in which they work.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] saw it, and what an eloquent plea he made for the Prouty amendment, and how proud I was and privileged to join him in its support.

Because I think this issue is of such vital concern to the administration of justice in this country, I propose to speak on it at some length.

Even though I believe that administrative agencies are the best device for the effective protection of labor's right, I am satisfied that the gross injustice caused by the adoption of the conference report in this no man's land area would have been avoided. Not only are the rights of small unions and employees not protected by proper unfair labor practice prohibition, but also no election machinery is available for the determination of whether a union represents the employees of an employer. Recognition strikes in States where a State court will not enjoin them must, as in the days before the Wagner Act, be the sole means of compelling an employer to recognize a union.

Section 701 of the conference bill amends the National Labor Relations Act by adding a new section 14(c). This new subsection 14(c) is in two parts. In 14(c)(i), the Board is expressly given authority to decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute if the effect of such labor disputes in the opinion of the Board is not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction. To this grant of discretionary authority there is only the proviso that the Board shall not decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute over which it would assert jurisdiction under the standards prevailing on August 1, 1959.

I pause at that point to say, Mr. President, I think it is a gimmick. I think in administration it will come to mean no protection at all. And yet some of my fellow conferees think this is a great victory because they succeeded in getting the date line of August 1, 1959.

Part 2 of the new subsection gives to State courts and agencies the power to assume and assert jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the Board declines to assert jurisdiction pursuant to paragraph 1.

This provision is deceptively simple. It attempts to solve a very difficult problem in a quick and easy way which, in fact, will create far more difficulties than it resolves and which is contrary to the elementary principles of uniformity and certainty as well as to the principles which have been embodied in our Federal labor relations laws for more than 20 years.

It is apparent to me that those who drafted this provision are really not very familiar with what the National Labor Relations Board is or what it does.

The National Labor Relations Board does not decide labor disputes. It does not take jurisdiction over labor disputes, which I am sure will come as news to many, because as one talks to people, it is apparent that is the assumption many persons hold to.

I suppose everyone knows that the current steel strike is a labor dispute, but it is perfectly clear that the National Labor Relations Board has no authority to decide that labor dispute or to take jurisdiction over it. What the National Labor Relations Board does is take jurisdiction over proceedings. Those proceedings are of two kinds—representation proceedings and unfair labor practice proceedings. Sometimes those proceedings involve a labor dispute. Many times they do not. The Board, nevertheless, does take jurisdiction if there is any claim that an unfair labor practice has been committed or if the parties want an election conducted.

To speak, therefore, as this section of the conference bill does, of labor disputes over which the Board declines to exercise jurisdiction is to speak in terms which make no sense under the National Labor Relations Act.

I am not quibbling about terminology. The distinction between a jurisdictional standard written in terms of labor disputes and a jurisdictional standard written in terms of proceedings is a profound one. A jurisdictional standard which excludes certain kinds of disputes from the Board's jurisdiction is one which would be exercised in relationship to the facts of the dispute. A jurisdictional standard such as the Board's standard which relates to proceedings is exercised in relation to the particular proceeding.

Let me give a simple example. The Board has standards stated in dollar terms relating to the amount of inflow or outflow of a particular employer. Suppose that unfair labor practices are charged against either an employer or against a union with respect to conduct related to that employer. Suppose, further, that at the time the unfair labor practice occurred the employer did not meet the Board's jurisdictional standards. Would the Board exercise jurisdiction? The answer to that question is not—and I repeat "not"—necessarily no. The question which the Board decides is not whether the employer's business in the year in which the unfair labor practice occurred was sufficient to meet its standards but whether the business shown in the financial report available at the time of hearing is sufficient to meet its standards. The limitation is on the Board's proceedings, not on the factual situation—Aroostook Federation of Farmers, 114 NLRB 538, 36 L.R.R.M. 1611 (1955); Western Machine and Tool Company, 115 NLRB 978, 37 L.R.R.M. 1467 (1956).

Conversely, if a union files an election petition, the Board will take jurisdiction if the employer's business in the prior year was sufficient to meet the Board's standards even though the employer can show at the hearing that he has sold part of his business and that his current business does not meet the Board's standards—Whippany Motor Company, 115 NLRB 52, 37 L.R.R.M. 1234 (1956).

These rules are proper if it is understood that the Board's standards do not serve to define the area over which the National Labor Relations Act applies but only serve to define the particular cases which the Board will handle. If the Board actually did decline to assert jurisdiction over disputes, then it would be wholly improper to require an employer whose business is increasing to justify action taken when he was not subject to the act, and it would also be improper to force an employer whose business was declining to comply with a nonexistent duty to bargain in the future.

Nor can it be answered that the Board can change its jurisdictional standards. For as I read the proviso in the new section 14(c)(i), proposed in section 701 of the conference bill, the Board is prohibited from declining to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute over which it would assert jurisdiction under the standards prevailing on August 1, 1959.

Although that is claimed to be an expression of intent, Mr. President, it will be a very interesting situation to watch as the Board attempts to administer the section.

Before turning to the most important part of section 701, the delegation of jurisdiction to State courts, there is another point which should be noted. Section 14(c)(i) contains a sleeper. It specifically authorizes the Board to decline to assert jurisdiction where in the Board's opinion the effect on commerce is not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction. I think that the drafters of this provision may have believed that they were not in this way changing the law. But a careful examination of the precedents shows that this would indeed involve a considerable change in the law. First of all, it has never been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the National Labor Relations Board, under the present law, has authority to decline to exercise jurisdiction in representation cases affecting commerce. The only cases which my research has disclosed are cases in which the Board refused to process unfair labor practice charges. And the courts in those cases have specifically relied on the statutory language in section 10(a) of the present act that "the Board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice." This language, the courts have said, implies that the Board has discretion not to institute unfair labor practice proceedings.

But when we turn to the section of the act dealing with representation proceedings, we find that the statutory language is quite different. It provides in section 9(c)(i) that whenever a petition is filed which meets the statutory requirements "the Board shall investigate such petition and if it has reasonable cause to believe that a question of representation affecting commerce exists shall provide for an appropriate hearing." If the Board then finds that such a question of representation exists, the statute continues "it shall direct an election." This language is quite different from the language in the unfair labor practice provision which simply gives the power to the Board to act. So far as I know only two cases have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States dealing with the power of the National Labor Relations Board to decline to hold an election where it finds that a question of representation affecting commerce exists but the employer does not meet its jurisdictional standards. Those two cases were Office Employees v. NLRB, 353 U.S. 313, and Hotel Employees v. Leedom, 358 U.S. 99. In both cases, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the Board and directed it to consider the representation petition. It did not, in either case, reach the question of whether the Board had authority to decline representation cases in general because in each case it found that the Board has exercised its discretion in an arbitrary and unreasonable manner.

Section 701 of the conference bill, if we assume that "labor dispute" means representation proceedings—a question on which I can find no answer in the bill—would completely eliminate the power of the courts to review the Board's exercise of its claim of discretion to entertain representation cases. Even if it is assumed, contrary to what I believe is the plain language of existing law, that the Board has the power to refuse to take jurisdiction in representation cases, just as it is conceded that it has such power in unfair labor cases, still under present law in both classes of cases, the Board's discretion is subject to review. But as I read the new section 14(c)(i) which the conference bill proposes to insert in the act, the Board's opinion as to the effect of a labor dispute is made unreviewable.

That scares me to death. It shocks me. I find it difficult to understand its inclusion.

Well, as an old teacher of administrative law and legislation, Mr. President, I know in some circumstances it is desirable to give finality to some administrative board or quasi-judicial administrative law tribunal in determining a simple question of fact.

It is dangerous to give to any administrative board or officer unreviewable authority which involves serious implications as to legal rights. That is exactly what is sought to be done in this case.

Mr. President, one of the precious checks we had better hold fast in this Republic is the review of decisions of mere men placed in positions of power and judgment, whether they are on the National Labor Relations Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, or any other administrative law tribunal. The question for determination in considering the measure in which this unreviewable power is given involves, in my judgment, precious rights of free men and women in the labor movement. Thus, the bill gives to the Board a power which it probably does not have now as to representation cases and makes that power, in both representation and unfair labor cases, unreviewable.

The only protection contained in the new section 14(c)(i) is the provision that the Board must now assert jurisdiction under the standards prevailing on August 1, 1959. The tremendous difficulties that will be created by this form of limitation upon the discretion which this bill makes otherwise unreviewable, I will avert to later.

I turn now to paragraph 2 of the proposed section 14(c). This says that nothing in the act shall prevent any agency or the courts of any State or territory from "assuming and asserting" jurisdiction over labor disputes which the Board declines to take. This provision, I believe, is totally unworkable. And even if it were workable and understandable, it would, in my view, be wholly objectionable in principle.

Before proceeding to a statement of the objections to this provision in principle, I want to ask certain questions as to what the conference bill means. As a lawyer, I do not know what is meant by the use of the two words "assuming" and "asserting." Giving the court the power to assume jurisdiction would, I would assume, be sufficient. I do not know what is intended by the additional words giving the courts who assume jurisdiction the right also to assert jurisdiction.

More important, I do not understand how this provision is supposed to operate. Is it proposed that the Board or the State courts should make the determination as to whether a dispute is one over which the Board would decline to assert jurisdiction? As I read the language of the proposed section, it is the Board which is to make this determination, and it is only after the Board determines that it should decline to exercise jurisdiction in a particular dispute that the State court is to be given the authority to assume and assert its jurisdiction. Indeed I can hardly conceive of any possible method of administering this provision under any other reading.

As I noted above, the Board does not base its exercise or nonexercise of jurisdiction over the amount of interstate commerce involved as of the time of an unfair labor practice or, in the case of a representation proceeding, as of the time of an election. It bases its decision to exercise or not exercise jurisdiction on the facts in existence at the date of its hearing which is normally considerably after an unfair labor practice and considerably before an election. Now how a State court could determine the date on which the Board would hold its hearing if the decision were to be made by the State court in the first instance is simply beyond me.

But this just begins to explore the difficulties. Under its present standards, which this proposed new section would prevent the Board from restricting, the Board will assert jurisdiction in a proceeding even if the employer involved in that proceeding does not meet the Board's standards. It will do so if the employer refuses to make available to the Board's agencies the data necessary to make a determination as to quantity or nature of his business. Suppose we have an employer who would refuse to give the Board the necessary information. Under its present standards, the Board would accept jurisdiction over a proceeding involving his employees. Is a State court to make that determination? And if it is to make that determination, upon what basis can it possibly do so?

Even if we assume that there were not these vagaries in the Board's standards, still other difficulties would ensue if a State court were to make the first determination as to whether the Board would or would not take jurisdiction in a particular case. First of all, the Board's standards are incredibly complex.

At one time the Board applied separate standards to interstate and intrastate retail chains. If a union claimed recognition only in the intrastate portion of a retail chain, the Board might take jurisdiction, although it would refuse to take jurisdiction, on the same showing as to the amount of interstate business done, if the chain were an interstate one. Again, where several corporate entities are involved in the same general business enterprise, it is almost impossible to tell whether the Board's decision to assert jurisdiction will be based on the aggregate business of the separate corporations or whether they will be separately considered. The Board has sometimes decided both ways with respect to the same enterprise. Compare Orkin "The Rat Man," 112 N.L.R.B. 762 with Orkin Exterminating Co., 115 N.L.R.B. 622. And the same corporate combination can be either inside or outside of the Board's standards, depending on whether there is centralized control of labor relations matters.

Indeed, the Board's jurisdictional provisions are so complex and so confusing that many persons have urged that the Board has, in fact, expended more time under its present standards in determining which case to take than it would have spent if it had taken all of the cases excluded by those standards.

Whether this conclusion be true or not, it is certain that in many cases the Board now will spend more time investigating the indirect inflow and indirect outflow of a given employer than it would have spent in holding a hearing and conducting an election. As the Board itself said when it recently revised some of its standards:

> The ascertainment of inflow figures often involves extensive examination of an employer's records in which every purchase must be considered, which is time consuming both for personnel of the employer involved and the Board. (Carolina Supplies & Cement Co., 122 N.L.R.B. No. 17, 43 L.R.R.M. 1060.)

If it were the intention of the conference bill to impose the duty or the power to make the initial determination upon the State courts, the result surely would be the one predicted by a Michigan court in 1954:

> Neither the courts nor the litigants can know with any certainty where jurisdiction lies, nor whether in a given case jurisdiction existing at the time of its commencement will continue until its final decision. (Universal Car Co. v. IAM, Michigan Circuit Court, 1954, 35 L.R.R.M. 2087, 2098.)

Each State court would have the dubious duty of examining, in each case brought to it for decision, the complex and complicated standards established by the Board and determining whether, in the given case, under such standards, the Board would exercise jurisdiction. In fact they have to outguess the Board. I have already adverted to the difficulty which this would place on the State courts. Perhaps it is best set forth in the study made by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress in 1957 in which it is said that "even the Board experts cannot agree on the boundaries of Board jurisdiction under present standards."

Nor is this the end. Suppose that in a given case an employer contends that the Board would not take jurisdiction and the union contends that it would. Deciphering the Board's standards would be an incredible job for a county court in which one party or the other sought an injunction. But then the question could presumably be appealed and we would have the intermediate appellate courts and the supreme courts of the States and finally the Supreme Court of the United States deciding the hypothetical question of what the National Labor Relations Board properly would have done under its jurisdiction standards if the case had been presented to it in the first instance. This surely would constitute a travesty on the orderly administration of justice.

For these reasons I must assume that what the conference bill means is what it says: That State courts can assert jurisdiction over a dispute after the Board has declined to assert its jurisdiction pursuant to the power given to it in paragraph 1 of the proposed section 14(c). That construction at least permits the Board to decide and to apply its jurisdictional standards and does not mean that the State courts in the 50 States of the United States will be given the primary jurisdiction to make the initial determination as to whether the Board's standards are met or are not met in a particular proceeding. But even this reading does not eliminate the technical difficulties in this seemingly simple provision. As I said at the beginning, the Labor Board does not now and never has refused to assert jurisdiction over particular employers. It refuses jurisdiction in particular proceedings. The same employer and indeed the same labor dispute can be both inside and outside of the Board's standards, depending on the nature of the proceeding. Let me give a simple example. Suppose that a union claims recognition as the representative of the employees of a particular employer. Suppose that the employer's business volume is such that the Board would not assert jurisdiction over a petition for an election filed by the union. Indeed, assume that the union filed such a petition and that the Board decides that it will not take jurisdiction. Suppose that the union then, frustrated in its efforts to obtain an election or recognition, begins a secondary boycott of the products of this employer and that an unfair labor practice charge is then filed against the union. The Board now will in fact take jurisdiction over the unfair labor practice proceeding, although it refused jurisdiction over the representation proceeding, if the total business volume of all of the affected employers, both primary and secondary, added together equal the amounts specified in the applicable Board standard—McAllister Transfer Inc., 110 N.L.R.B. 1769 (1954).

The same dispute as to the representation of employees thus will be heard by the Board if the proceeding is a secondary boycott proceeding but will not be heard by the Board if it is a representation proceeding. Indeed, the Board goes further. In the case I have given, if the union had filed an unfair labor practice charge against the first employer because he refused to recognize it, the Board would have dismissed that proceeding under its jurisdictional standards. If the union then proceeded to set up a secondary boycott, the Board would then assert jurisdiction and in the course of exercising that jurisdiction would in fact decide the original unfair labor practice charge which it would not have heard if no secondary boycott had been begun—Reilly Cartage Co., 110 N.L.R.B. 1742.

Now, where does this simple-looking provision in the conference bill fit in in this kind of a situation? Presumably, when the Board first declined to assert jurisdiction the State could move in. If it were a State like Florida, it also would not hold an election but would enjoin picketing unless the union had supplied to the employer a list of its members before it began picketing—Boca Raton Club v. Hotel Employees Union, 83 So. 2d 11. But if the union then began its secondary boycott, there could be a proceeding over which the Labor Board would assert jurisdiction. What would happen then to the State court's jurisdiction? Would it become void? If it would become void for lack of jurisdiction, what would be the date upon which it became void—the date upon which the facts occurred, which, under the Board's standards could lead to a Board proceeding, or the date on which a charge was filed with the National Board, or the date on which the Board decided that it would take jurisdiction? I find no answers to any of these questions in the provisions of the proposed new section.

Perhaps it will be argued that the cases which I have mentioned are unusual cases and that the usual case is far simpler and presents no such complications. I seriously dispute any such contention. Those who have not had experience with the complexities and intricacies of the Board's standards can have no conception of the difficulties involved in applying them.

Thus, for example, if there is in existence an employer association which bargains as a unit with a union the Board will permit the business of all of the members of the association to be added together in determining whether the jurisdictional standards are met. However, under established Board rule, an employer may take himself out of such a bargaining unit by the simple device of resigning from the association. The question then, in dealing with a proceeding involving the employees of a particular employer, may be whether he has manifested an intention of being a member of an employer association for purposes of collective bargaining. If he has, the Board will take jurisdiction. If he has not, or if he has resigned from the association, the Board will refuse jurisdiction in the absence of any showing that the business of the individual employer is sufficient to meet the Board's standards. Whether or not the Board would take jurisdiction cannot be ascertained from the employer's business but only from the evidence as to his relationship with the association at the time the unfair labor practice hearing occurs.

Difficulties of a different nature occur in connection with public utility and transit companies. One of the bases upon which the Board will assume jurisdiction is the inflow or outflow, direct or indirect, of goods or services outside the State. The amount required is $50,000. But in a number of areas the Board has gross volume standards. Thus it will not take jurisdiction over a transit company or a public utility unless it grosses $250,000 a year. What of the case in which a transit company or public utility provides goods or services valued at more than $50,000 to an enterprise over which the Board did exercise jurisdiction. This would meet the Board's indirect outflow standard. Will that standard be used as a basis for asserting jurisdiction, even though the company does not meet the standards for a public utility or a transportation company? The answer depends in some cases upon whether the only impact of the operation of the company involved upon the community is its provision of services to the interstate employer. If the company, as in Potash Mines Transportation Co., 116 N.L.R.B. No. 179, 38 L.R.R.M. 1460, performs services only, or in major part, on a private basis for the interstate enterprise then the Board will assume jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, the company serves a broader section of the community and its services for particular employers, although as much as in the first case, are only part of its total public service, then the Board will not assert jurisdiction:

> If the Greenwich Gas standard applies, the standards enunciated in Jones-

Similarly, if an enterprise supplies coal or water, or any other materials or services in the amount of more than $50,000 to interstate industrial firms, the Board will assert jurisdiction. But, if it in addition supplies these same materials or services on a public basis to the community in general, jurisdiction will be refused—Gary Hobart Water Corp., 115 N.L.R.B. 1575, 38 L.R.R.M. 1123 (1956).

On the other hand, if water, steam, and electricity are supplied on a private basis by a firm which does not offer its services to the general public but supplies them in connection with the lease of an industrial building to manufacturers subject to the act, then the $250,000 public utility standard, not the indirect outflow standard, will be applied—East Newark Realty Corp., 115 N.L.R.B. 483, 37 L.R.R.M. 1328 (1956).

I could go on in this vein indefinitely. What I have said should be sufficient, I think, to indicate the tremendous practical difficulties which will ensue if the seemingly simple provision contained in section 701 of the Conference committee bill should be adopted.

However, I hope that what I have said is sufficient to indicate the tremendous practical difficulty which will ensue if the seemingly simple provision contained in section 701 of the conference committee bill should be adopted.

I now turn to what is even more important: the basic impropriety and injustice of what is proposed to be done here, however ineptly and inartistically it is done.

It would be one thing to allow the States which have established labor relations boards and have provided the machinery for holding elections and for punishing unfair labor practices to exercise jurisdiction over firms engaged in interstate commerce. In permitting such States to operate in this area, Congress would be acting consistently with its own regulation of labor relations matters in interstate commerce. But it is a far different thing, indeed, to give to State courts the right to assert jurisdiction where there is no labor relations law at all in the State, where there is no provision for conducting elections and where there is no provision for preventing or punishing unfair labor practices. As the Library of Congress study to which I have already referred concludes:

> The application of State tort law may create inequities because unfair labor practices committed by employers are normally not considered common law torts, while most unfair labor practices by unions or employees do constitute common law torts.

The effect of this provision therefore, would be to allow the States to enforce only antiunion provisions even in the absence of the most elementary kind of protection for the right of free collective bargaining.

This is not a hypothetical statement. I should like to recite in some detail what actually happened in a series of cases which were ultimately decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, to show precisely the kind of effect which this provision would have. The cases to which I refer are Hotel Employees v. Sax Enterprises, 358 U.S. 270, and Hotel Employees v. Leedom, 358 U.S. 99. Those cases arose out of the attempt of the Hotel Workers Union to organize the employees of the luxury hotels in Miami and Miami Beach.

In March 1955, the union sought by conferences with the representatives of the individual hotels, the employees of which it had organized, to set up a procedure by which the union could establish by secret ballot its rights to bargain collectively for the employees. The Board at that time refused to exercise jurisdiction over hotels. The employers refused to agree to an election conducted by the Honest Ballot Association or by the mayor or by anyone else. And so ultimately the union was forced to strike.

Immediately the employers went to the State court. In the first case to be decided by a trial court the employer alleged that the picketing was violent and that the union had attempted to coerce the employees. The trial court found that there was no violence and no coercion. The employer claimed that the union did not represent a majority of its employees and that the purpose of the picketing was to compel the employers to compel the employees to join the union. The trial court found that this allegation, if true, would constitute the basis for an injunction against picketing and set the matter down for hearing. The employers appealed to the Supreme Court of Florida and the Supreme Court of Florida held that the trial court was required to issue an injunction on the sworn complaint, even in the absence of any evidence to support the allegations of that complaint—Sax v. Hotel Employees Union, 8 So. 2d 602.

That gives some idea of what I mean when I say that employees working in interstate commerce are being put at the mercy of the State courts, which, under the bill, are not required to follow Federal law, but which under the Prouty amendment would have been required to follow Federal law.

Obedient to the commands of the Florida Supreme Court, the Florida trial court issued injunctions not only in the first case but also in six other cases in which similar requests for temporary relief had been filed. It enjoined the picketing of the hotels, and it went further. It enjoined any publication, anywhere in the United States, of the fact that a strike was in effect at these hotels or that the hotels had refused to recognize the union.

The supreme court finally had something to say about that, but I respectfully submit that the conference bill is an attempt to reestablish that condition. I could not possibly vote for the conference report with this provision in it.

The cases then were called for hearing, with the injunctions in effect. In several cases the trial courts found that the union in fact did represent a majority of the employees. In some cases the union actually brought a majority of the employees into court to testify that they wanted the union to represent them. There they were before the very eyes of the judge. They left no room for doubt as to their wishes.

The trial courts therefore vacated the injunctions which the Supreme Court of Florida had commanded them to issue. Again appeals were taken to the Supreme Court of Florida and again the Supreme Court of Florida reversed. The supreme court now said that the showing at the time of the hearing that the union represented a majority was insufficient. The union had to show that it represented the employees of the employer before it began to picket. Since it had failed to do so, the picketing should be enjoined—Boca Raton Club v. Hotel Employees, 83 So. 2d 11. Meanwhile, the union had organized the employees at still other hotels. Aware of the directives of the Supreme Court of Florida, the union invited a certified public accountant to examine its books and the signed membership applications on file in its offices. It wrote to the employer, asking agreement on the conduct of an election and forwarded to the employer the sworn statement of the accountant that the union's books showed that a majority of his employees were in fact members of the union. The employer refused to agree to any method of ascertaining the employees wishes in secret, but insisted that they be individually interrogated. The union, of course, could not agree, since Florida law does not provide an unfair labor practice procedure, and the plain result of any individual interrogation by the employer before a strike was called would be the discharge of all the employees who said they were members of the union. When the employer refused to recognize the union or to agree to a secret ballot election, the union then did not strike in these later cases, but simply began to picket, and its signs plainly stated that the reason for the picketing was that the employer had refused to agree to an election.

In these cases, the employers again petitioned for an injunction against the picketing. In one of the cases, the trial court found, in fact, that the union had established that a majority of the members had chosen it as their representative. Again, the Supreme Court of Florida reversed, this time simply by a per curiam opinion—R. S. Levy v. Hotel Employees Union, 83 So. 2d 852.

In one case a trial judge decided that the only way out of the impasse created by the Florida Supreme Court's application of State laws was to itself conduct an election. It issued an order providing for the appointment of a commissioner to conduct the election. Pending the holding of the election and in order to preserve the status quo, the court enjoined the union from picketing. The employer appealed. The Supreme Court of Florida reversed that part of the trial court's order which provided for an election but retained that part of the order which provided for the prohibition of picketing pending the holding of an election—Thomas Jefferson, Inc. v. Hotel Employees Union, 34 So. 2d 583.

The court, it might be said, had them both ways there. It enjoined picketing and, in effect, enjoined an election.

None of these decisions could be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States since they were all temporary injunctions. It was not until 2 years after the decisions began in March 1957 that final orders in these cases were entered by the Supreme Court of Florida. Then and then only could the union take the cases to the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Court of the United States, in Hotel Employees v. Sax Enterprises (358 U.S. 270), held simply that Florida had no jurisdiction to enjoin picketing because this was activity governed by the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. That decision was rendered in January 1959.

Mr. President, does it surprise anyone that in this country there is underway such a concerted drive to include in this bill a provision which, in effect, would get around that decision? That Supreme Court decision is a land-mark decision in support of economic freedom for free workers in our country; and I do not intend to vote for a conference report which, in my judgment, will scuttle that freedom because it will permit of procedures which will enable some employers to scuttle it.

If a similar sequence of events were to occur after the enactment of this bill, and if the board then—as it did in the Florida hotel cases—refused to assert jurisdiction, the Supreme Court would be compelled to say that Florida was free to do what, in fact, Florida did do in those cases.

The Florida hotel cases illustrate more than the evils of paragraph 2 of the proposed new section 14(c); they also illustrate the evils of paragraph 1, for in those cases the union sought throughout to obtain an election by the National Labor Relations Board. And when the Board refused to conduct an election, the union brought suit against the Board, and stated that the Board's refusal to assert its jurisdiction was arbitrary. The Supreme Court of the United States ultimately sustained that contention. In Hotel Employees v. Leedom (358 U.S. 99), the Supreme Court reversed the Board, and remanded the case to it. If the proposed section 14(c) contained in the bill now before the Senate had been in effect last year, the Supreme Court could not have reversed the Board's refusal to act, and the hotel employees would still be unable to obtain an election.

It is true that because this litigation concerning Miami Beach hotels was actually concluded in the early part of this year, and because the Board, responsive to the Supreme Court's decision, did ultimately assert jurisdiction over the hotels involved, the same sequence of events could not now occur with respect to the same hotels. The Board has now decided that it will take jurisdiction over hotels doing an annual gross business of $500,000 or more. But precisely the same thing that happened in Florida in the years before the Supreme Court forced the Board to take jurisdiction could take place in other industries—and, indeed, could take place in the hotel industry, so long as the particular hotels involved fell below the Board's present jurisdictional standards.

I do not suggest that we should rectify the injustice shown in the Florida hotel litigation. That injustice has been rectified, because, first, the Board's discretion as to jurisdiction has been reversed by the courts; and because, second, the States now are forbidden to exercise jurisdiction, even though the Board refuses to do so, so long as interstate commerce is involved. But I do say that the avenues through which the injustice in the Florida hotel cases was rectified will be foreclosed by this bill; and there is nothing in this bill to prevent, in other industries and with respect to other employers, what took place in Florida.

Mr. President, I now conclude my remarks on the no man's land issue, by saying, again, that all I am pleading for is that the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States be applied uniformly to all citizens of the United States regardless of the States in which they may live. My point is just as simple as that.

We must never forget, Mr. President, that in all the cases to which the provision of the conference report to which I am now objecting applies, the workers are working on jobs that fall within the meaning of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. I respectfully submit that even though they are working in small plants, they are still entitled to the same protections, under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, that an automobile worker in Detroit, Mich., or an airplane worker in Los Angeles, Calif., is entitled to. We had better watch out, if we start to segmentize the Constitution of the United States on the basis of varying rights, depending upon the size of the plant in which the worker is employed. This no man's land provision is a great mistake; and this conference report should be sent back to conference, and the conferees should be instructed that the Senate will not adopt the report until the conferees reestablish the principle of uniform application of the interstate commerce clause to all American workers who are working in interstate commerce jobs.

SECONDARY BOYCOTTS

Mr. President, I turn now to secondary boycotts.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to answer a question. However, my real desire is to finish with the presentation of my manuscript and then to have questions asked.

Mr. CARROLL. Very well; I shall be happy to abide by the Senator's preference.

Mr. MORSE. I assure the Senator from Colorado that I am in no need of a rest.

Mr. President, in 1947 Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act in an atmosphere somewhat akin to the present one. In that case, pressures built up during 6 years of war, and suppressed by the controls on both wages and prices, were suddenly released. The result was a tremendous wave of serious and long strikes. The public acquired the feeling that labor had become too powerful and needed to be curbed. The result of that feeling was the Taft-Hartley Act, which brought many desirable reforms, but certainly significantly unrelated to the spectacular strikes in the mass production industries. In the 12 years since enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act the secondary boycott provision has become recognized as an extremely complex piece of legislation. The 12 years' experience suggested, to all who understood it, a need for revision, both on behalf of employers who suffered from legislative loopholes and on behalf of unions who suffered what any fair-minded person would consider injustices.

In order to handle this difficult problem, the Senate Labor Committee appointed an advisory panel, consisting of six public members of indisputable preeminence in the labor relations field, three attorneys from labor, and three from industry. In the atmosphere of this group, recommendations for the improvement and rewriting of the secondary boycott sections of the Taft-Hartley Act would have been forthcoming.

Mr. President, earlier this afternoon I discussed that matter, and I paid my very high compliments and my most sincere compliments to the chairman of that special commission.

Mr. President, in my judgment the following defects in existing law should be remedied:

First. In banning secondary boycotts, the Taft-Hartley Act does not provide any allowance for the equities involved in the primary labor dispute. Thus, a canning factory employer who was committing every kind of unfair labor practice, and was paying substandard wages, and with whom the union had a primary dispute, could have his canned goods sold at retail stores, free from secondary pressure by the union. By preventing the sale of the cans at such a store, in many instances little hardship or loss woud have been caused to the owner of the store; and a law permitting the union to stop handling such unfair products, provided the retail store suffered no serious economic loss, might have been developed. The Landrum-Griffin bill has made no effort to cure this problem.

Second. The secondary boycott ban is based upon the concept of two employers—a primary and a secondary employer. The theory is that a neutral employer should not be compelled to suffer because of a labor dispute the union has with somebody else, but the theory breaks down when the two employers are "allies." Senator Taft said that the secondary boycott section "is not intended to apply to a case where the third party is, in effect, in cahoots with, or acting as a part of, the primary employer."

The National Labor Relations Board and the courts have failed to keep Senator Taft's concept in mind. The Board has considered subsidiaries to be separate employers. Other enterprises, substantially controlled by the same persons, have been considered separate employers, even though one manufactured a product incorporated into the finished article produced by the other. The case of the building and construction industry represented probably the most flagrant injustice, where a general contractor is, in effect, entirely in control of the kind of labor relations taking place on a jobsite which he runs. He lets subcontracts based upon price, responsibility, and the ability to handle labor relations.

He lets those contracts, very well knowing the kind of labor relations which may exist within any of the subcontractor companies. He is not acting in the dark, Mr. President. He is not innocent of any unfair labor policies on the part of a subcontractor.

The Board and the Supreme Court, in the Denver Building Trades case, held that this very unified relationship was a group of separate employers; hence, a primary dispute with one of them would have to be conducted in a way not to induce the employees of the other contractors on the job to refrain from work. This case is especially interesting on its facts, which involved an electrical subcontractor paying 42 cents an hour below the negotiated area rate. That such a subcontractor was on the job at all was directly due to a decision by the general contractor, and it is difficult to see how a union inducement of his employees to leave work can be justly prohibited; and yet that is the interpretation which we tried, during the past few days, to eliminate. A similar ally problem exists in the garment industry. Apparently, NLRB complaints have not been issued frequently in that industry, following the 1949 colloquy between Senators Taft and Ives on this subject.

In short, the Taft-Hartley secondary boycott provisions have demonstrated a real need to make a sound examination of the ally problem.

Third. The Taft-Hartley Act provided a mandatory injunction procedure whenever a violation occurred. In many instances, the equities of the situation suggested that the injunction procedure was not appropriate. A mandatory injunction procedure was not applicable to unfair labor practices committed by employers, and yet equally irreparable hurt to the rights of employees are daily committed, and remedied, if at all, after many months and years of litigation. The manifest unfairness of these quite divergent procedures suggest strongly a need for revision in the basic law. Unfortunately, the Landrum-Griffin bill and the conference report, like it, made no such revisions.

Mr. President, I desire to introduce my proposals made in conference for a modification of the law in respect to secondary boycott and picketing problems. I shall not take the time to read them, but only ask unanimous consent that they may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOYCOTTS AND PICKETING

SEC. 705. (a) Section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individuals employed by any person to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials or commodities or to perform any services; or (ii) to intimiate any person where in either case an object thereof is:

"(A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor organization or employer organization, or to enter into any agreement not permitted by section (e).

"(B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person, unless such other producer, processor, manufacturer or other person is failing to recognize a union chosen by a majority of his employees or has committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of section 8(a).

"(C) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees or seeking to represent the employees of such employer or to protest the working conditions of such employer other than a work assignment dispute within the meaning of clause D of this paragraph, if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9;

"(D) forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular trade, craft or class rather than to employees in another trade, craft, or class unless such employer is failing to conform to an order or determination of the Board or an agreed upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute: Provided, That nothing contained in this subsection (b) shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by employees of any person to enter upon the premises of any other person if the employees are engaged in a primary labor dispute: Provided further, That for the purposes of section 8(b) of the Act, the phrases "any person" or "other person" will not be deemed to include the relationship between (i) contractor and jobbers engaged in a system of manufacturing garments; (ii) joint ventures, prime contractors, subcontractors, or cocontractors, jointly engaged on the site of a building and construction project or similar undertaking; or (iii) businesses doing business with one another when one is owned or controlled by the other or is owned or controlled substantially in common."

(b)(1) Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer who is a common carrier subject to part II of the Interstate Commerce Act to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, or transporting any of the products handled, manufactured or transported by another person, and any collective bargaining contract entered into heretofore or hereafter containing such an agreement shall be to such extent unenforceable and void."

(2) Any contract or agreement between an employer and a labor organization heretofore or hereafter executed which is, or which calls upon anyone to engage in, an unfair labor practice under section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, shall to such extent be unenforceable and void.

(c) Section 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6), and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to picket or cause to be picketed, or threaten to picket or cause to be picketed, any employer where the object thereof is forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees or forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective bargaining representative unless such labor organization is currently certified as the representative of such employees:

"(A) where within the preceding nine months a valid election under section 9(e) of this Act has been conducted, or

"(B) where the union had picketed for more than thirty days in the absence of a petition under section 9(e): Provided, That the employer was not paying substandard wages."

(d) Section 10(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by: (1) adding after the words "section 8(b)", the words, "or section (e)"; (2) at the end of the first sentence, strike the period and insert a comma and the following: "and other unfair labor practices growing out of the same labor dispute."; (3) in the second sentence after the words "he shall", insert: "if under all the circumstances equitable relief is appropriate," and (4) by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "and section 8(b)(7): Provided further, That where a charge is filed under section 8(b)(7), it shall be a defense to show that an unfair labor practice within the meaning of section 8(a) has been committed: Provided further, That where there is a failure to seek such appropriate relief the Board shall promptly make public the reasons for such failure."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have inserted my proposals in the RECORD because I want to show that I did my very best to try to work out some compromises on this subject. I demonstrated by these proposals my willingness to go along with some modifications on the subject of secondary boycotts; that I felt that supporting them would not do irreparable damage to legitimate labor rights.

Apart from not grappling with these inequities, the Landrum-Griffin bill was an effective and efficient instrument for closing the loopholes about which employers have rightly complained. With almost no changes, the conference has accepted the bill as passed by the House. To a degree, I applaud these "loophole" changes. A secondary boycott conducted by a single operating engineer running a hoist is just as effective as 10 bricklayers leaving the job in concert. Similarily, a secondary boycott carried out by inducing railroad employees should not be permitted, merely because the employees' employer is not covered by the Act. There are many instances also where a secondary boycott is conducted by a union agent going to a supervisor of employees, who often is a union member, and inducing him to shut off deliveries. Since the supervisor is subject to union discipline, such inducement would be clearly as effective as though inducement were applied to employees, themselves. To close these loopholes would seem to me to have been important legislation in this field.

A less desirable change is one which forbids a union to "threaten, coerce, or restrain" an employer to cease doing business with another. In this case, communications between the business agent and an employer will necessarily be subject to many interpretations, and many possibilities for untruthful testimony. Moreover, the Government will look ridiculous in being required to obtain an injunction against the union business agent speaking roughly to an employer about not handling the products of another.

Under existing law, "a union is free to approach an employer to persuade him to engage in a boycott, so long as it refrains from the specifically prohibited means of coercion through inducement of employees," Local 1976, United Brotherhood v. N.L.R.B., 357 U.S. 93, 99. Simply stated, this means that when a union has a dispute with company A concerning the conditions of employment at its plant, the union may not call out the employees of company B on strike, and it may not picket the premises of company B to induce its employees to strike, in order by such a strike or picketing to cause company B to stop doing business with company A. On the other hand, the union is not prohibited from asking company B to cooperate with it by ceasing to do business with company A during the time that company A's employees are on strike.

What is the reason which underlies this difference? If company B continues to do business with company A, it helps that company; if company B discontinues doing business with company A, it helps the union. But whatever company B does it unavoidably helps one side or the other. The union is forbidden to dragoon the assistance of company B by a strike or picketing to induce employees not to work. But surely the union must remain free to persuade company B to help it, exactly as company A is free to persuade company B to continue to do business with it. This is but the exercise of free speech on both sides of the controversy.

Mr. President, what we are asked to do is, in effect, to say that company B cannot take the union's side. Company B may be perfectly convinced that it is in the interest of its own business, of its own union, and of its own customers that company A not receive the support of company B. So I repeat, whatever position the company takes, it is going to help one side or the other.

I have difficulty reconciling that with fair play.

What are we seeking? We are seeking the end of violence. We are seeking the end of duress and coercion. But we are asked to take the position, Mr. President, against permitting Company B to sit down with the union, and have the union say, "Let me show you what these practices of company A are doing to the labor market in this area. Let me show you the effects. In your own best interest, let me show you what this is going to do from the standpoint of competition." And then company A agrees. Should company A be denied the right to enter into the kind of an agreement the bill seeks to make illegal?

It is a matter of evidentiary proof, but I say when that evidentiary proof shows there is no violence, no coercion, no duress, but that there was a good faith agreement and understanding that it was in the best interest of all concerned for the employer to help the union and not company A, I am against making that course of action unlawful.

But the bill changes this in many significant respects. First of all, it makes it an unfair labor practice "to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person" to engage in a boycott. Let us begin with the threat. It will be said that to prohibit the threat is not to prohibit persuasion. But the fact is that in the context of a living labor dispute the line between the two is far from meaningful. For example, suppose a union representative tells an employer, "We are having a strike at company A. Cooperate with us by not buying his goods until the strike is over." I trust all will agree that this is clearly persuasion. Suppose the union representative adds, "We have always gotten along well together. We want to be able to continue to do so. Do you think it would be wise for you to jeopardize our good relations by continuing to buy company A's products?" Has persuasion now become a veiled threat? Suppose the union representative goes on to say, "We realize that, because you have been barely able to get by, you have not complied strictly with our agreement but we have been willing to close our eyes to it. But our eyes will not remain shut if you don't stop buying company A's products." Is this an open threat?

It is not good sense to enact into law this slippery line between threats and persuasion. Nor is there any reason to. The actual act of calling the employees of Company B out on strike, or the actual act of picketing its premises to induce the employees to strike, is now forbidden. It is, therefore, simply idle talk to threaten to do either. Surely Company B must be presumed to have enough backbone to resist yielding to a threat which it knows cannot lawfully be carried out. Just as we allow free speech to an employer in persuading his employees not to join a union, even though we know full well that his speech often passes the psychological boundary from persuasion to coercion, just so much we allow free speech to the union. In the interest of the universal good of free speech, we have to risk having a particular employer cowed by talk, just as we risk having an individual employee cowed by talk.

Furthermore, the bill is not even limited to prohibiting a threat to strike or to induce a strike; it extends to any threat. But since the prohibited act is confined to a strike or inducement to strike, why should the prohibited threat extend beyond that? Are we now to police threats to truthfully reveal that an employer is a poor credit risk or a Fascist? I am not yet ready to commission an agency to administer a statute prohibiting threats at large.

A further limit on labor's right is in connection with the restriction on picketing when such picketing is not for the purpose of inducing employees. There has been no showing that this is an unfair device. Labor has traditionally been accorded the right to tell the public, particularly the buying public, that a particular product sold by a store has been produced under unfair conditions. The conference bill carefully preserves the right to advertise, but it bans the only effective type of advertisement in the form of a marching sign.

CONSUMER PICKETING

This bill does not stop with threats and with illegalizing the hot cargo agreement. It also makes it illegal for a union to "coerce, or restrain." This prohibits consumer picketing. What is consumer picketing? A shoe manufacturer sells his product through a department store. The employees of the shoe manufacturer go on strike for higher wages. The employees, in addition to picketing the manufacturer, also picket at the premises of the department store with a sign saying, "Do not buy X shoes." This is consumer picketing, an appeal to the public not to buy the product of a struck manufacturer. And more than two decades ago, in 1937, the New York Court of Appeals recognized the full legitimacy of such picketing:

> Where the manufacturer disposes of the product through retailers in unity of interest with it, unless the union may follow the product to the place where it is sold and peacefully ask the public to refrain from purchasing it, the union would be deprived of a fair and proper means of bringing its plea to the attention of the public (Goldfinger v. Feintuck, 276 N.Y. 281, 11 N.E. 2d 910.)

It was such decisions as this, Mr. President, along with the Norris-La Guardia Act, which took the yoke from around the necks of free men and women in the labor movement, the yoke which had been imposed upon them by the Bedford Stonecutters case. Those who have studied the history of the American labor movement well know the results of the Bedford Stonecutters case.

I am not saying Mr. President, that all the implications of the Bedford Stonecutters case will be revived by passage of the proposed legislation, but I am saying that too many of them will be.

I am saying, Mr. President, that if this proposed legislation is enacted, then this great language, precious to the rights of American labor, spoken by the court in the Goldfinger against Feintuck case, will become empty words.

Let me repeat what the court said:

> Where the manufacturer disposes of the product through retailers in unity of interest with it, unless the union may follow the product to the place where it is sold and peacefully ask the public to refrain from purchasing it, the union would be deprived of a fair and proper means of bringing its plea to the attention of the public.

We take a long and backward step when we illegalize consumer picketing. It is not enough to say that the union can make its appeal by newspaper advertisements and leaflet distribution. Advertisements are expensive, and both may be ineffective to quickly and dramatically catch the public's eye. Picketing is usually the only effective way of reaching the consumer at the only place where it matters—where the product is sold and at the time that the customer is interested in buying it. When we prohibit consumer picketing we compel the public, through ignorance of the situation, to side with the employer rather than the union. We prevent the consumer from making his own choice.

How retrogressive this bill is can be seen from the fact that even publicity other than picketing—leaflets and advertisements—is curbed. For the bill permits "publicity, other than picketing, as long as such publicity does not have an effect of inducing any individual employed by any person other than the primary employer" not to work at the place where the product is sold. Two things should be observed about this limitation. First of all, by excepting picketing, it acts on the assumption that consumer picketing inevitably and always causes employees not to work as well as customers not to buy. This is a false assumption, and experience has demonstrated its falsity. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit stated that (N.L.R.B. v. Business Machine Mechanics (228 F. 2d 553, 560)):

> It is true that picket lines are often effective to prevent union members from crossing them. But here there was no evidence that any of the employees of Royal's customers, working at the 37 picketed office buildings, were unionized either by local 459 or by any other union. Indeed it is likely that most or all of them were not as it is common knowledge that office workers are relatively unorganized. See also Monthly Labor Review, volume 78, No. 1, page 65 (U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, January 1955). It cannot be assumed that a picket line will prevent even unionized employees from crossing it when the union apparently intends that they shall cross and takes steps to make its intent plain. Such an assumption is even more doubtful when it appears, as it did here, that the employees unanimously disregarded the pickets and went to work. Cf. Douds v. Local 50, Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union (Arnold Bakers), 2 Cir., 1955, 224 F. 2d 49. Even the testimony of representatives of the picketed firms indicates that they had no fear that their employees would take any action to coerce them regarding their business with Royal. Their only fear seemed to be possible public embarrassment. Such embarrassment and persuasion the union is privileged to pursue.

Secondly, whatever the effect of publicity other than picketing, we are quite without constitutional power to prohibit free speech because of that effect. Whatever may be true of picketing, it is still true of pure speech that—

> The safeguarding of these means is essential to the securing of an informed and educated public opinion with respect to a matter which is of public concern. It may be that effective exercise of the means of advancing public knowledge may persuade some of those reached to refrain from entering into advantageous relations with the business establishment which is the scene of the dispute. Every expression of opinion on matters that are important has the potentiality of inducing action in the interests of one rather than another group in society. But the group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussion of matters of public interest merely on a showing that others may thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with its interests.

That is great language in a great case, decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 194.

On the basis of that case I hold with the late Chief Justice Stone that the "publication, unaccompanied by violence, of a notice that the employer is unfair to organized labor and requesting the public not to patronize him is an exercise of the right of free speech guaranteed by the first amendment which cannot be made unlawful by act of Congress." United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 243.

PICKETING

It will be recalled by my colleagues on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare that when Secretary Mitchell was before the committee he and I had an interesting colloquy in regard to picketing. The record will show that he asked if I would be willing to answer some questions, too, and I goodnaturedly said that I did not think, as a Senator, it was fair of me to ask him questions unless I could take questions in return.

So he sought to get me to state my views as to what limitations, if any, I thought ought to be placed on picketing. I said then, and I repeat today, that, with certain exceptions, I do not favor putting restrictions on picketing, so long as that picketing is peaceful. The cases are legion as to the protections the public and the employers are guaranteed in respect to peaceful picketing.

Certainly picketing in many instances is very effective. That is why antilabor employers wish to get rid of it. Certainly, Mr. President, public knowledge of labor practices on the part of an employer, as disclosed by picket signs, sometimes proves to be very embarrassing to the employer, particularly when the public proceeds to investigate and discover what the facts are.

The right to exercise free speech is a very precious right.

I always join with my colleagues in support of the proposition that violence cannot be supported; that mass picketing, which has the effect, really, of physical force, cannot be tolerated. However, Mr. President, it is rather regrettable if we have reached the point where we would try to restrict the exercise of free speech with so-called publicity picket lines.

So in my colloquy with the Secretary of Labor at the hearing before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, we discussed what was generally considered to be the most embarrassing situation for one who defends picket lines, as an economic weapon, which labor should have the right to exercise in seeking to improve its wages, hours, and working conditions.

There is an old hypothetical that has been kicked around in our committee discussions for the past several years. I never duck it. I refer to the restaurant picket line, in a town in which all industries are organized save one, and that employer not only refuses even to consider negotiating a labor contract, but all his employees are antiunion. That is a tough one. But it is the test.

The question was put to me, in effect, by the Secretary of Labor, "Does the senior Senator from Oregon believe that a public information picket line should be allowed in front of that restaurant?"

My answer is "Yes." A picket carrying a sign which says, "This restaurant unorganized" is an exercise of the right of free speech. Eaters who are not aware of the fact that it is an unorganized restaurant should not be denied the information that such a picket line supplies them, because many of them would eat elsewhere. I think it is the toughest of all the so-called consumer picket line hypotheticals.

That does not mean that the Senator from Oregon takes the position that labor can do anything in regard to picketing, because the record of the conference will show that in some instances I myself proposed that it is perfectly fair to place a time limitation in regard to the stretching of a picket line in certain circumstances.

Suppose there has been an election, and the union has lost overwhelmingly. The day after the election is over, bingo, there is another picket line. I think both the employer and the public are entitled to some protection in such a case. It is perfectly fair to have a rule that under such circumstances a picket line cannot be stretched in that kind of labor dispute, for a reasonable period of time. I was willing to go along with 12 months. First, 9 months was suggested, subject to this reservation:

Suppose that shortly after the election was lost the employer proceeded to adopt some labor practices that so aroused the members of his staff that they went to the union and said, "We have learned our lesson. We know now the kind of individual we are dealing with. We are ready to join." They join the union. There are the cards. The union then proceeds to say to that employer, "Here are the signed cards of an overwhelming majority of your employees." In that instance I think there should be provision for the kind of prohibition I am talking about. There should be a provision which would permit the Board to proceed immediately to consider that case with regard to representations; and there should be the right of the union in that instance to reestablish a picket line. I think we could adopt language—I tried to propose it in conference—to provide protection to the employer who does not fit into those facts, but who has a group of employees who do not want to join a union. Suppose an election were held under Board proceedings, and they voted not to join the union. I do not believe that the day after the vote, the employer should have to wake up and see a picket line in front of his plant. I think labor makes a great mistake in following such a course of action. I think it is reasonable to provide rules of the game, so to speak, that will give such an employer protection from having a picket line stretched before his plant, for at least a reasonable period of time.

I turn now to the next to the last subject I wish to discuss, namely "hot cargo."

HOT CARGO

"Hot cargo" is, in truth, an epithet applied to a provision in a labor-management agreement typical of the trucking industry. The Senate, because the hot cargo agreement had seemed to be abused, and because the Teamsters had shown up in the McClellan hearings as the union which had most clearly ignored its obligations to its employees and to the public, passed a bill making it illegal in the trucking industry to sign a hot cargo provision. In the rush of writing legislation on the floor, the hot cargo provision in the Senate bill could have been improved in order to more effectively carry out the purpose of the ban. The House bill, and now the conference report, have made it an unfair labor practice for any employer and a union to include in their agreement, a provision which imposes any conditions upon doing business with another employer.

The bill makes it illegal for a union and an employer "to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer" ceases or agrees to cease to do business with another employer or person. This is the so-called hot cargo agreement. Suppose a union approaches an employer and persuades him—by words that none can fail to recognize are nothing but persuasion—to cease buying the product of another employer whose employees are on strike. When the employer thus concurs in the union's plea, does that become an illegal "contract or agreement, express or implied"? Does the bill in effect compel the neutral employer to side with the struck employer rather than his employees and their union?

Furthermore, there is no reason to illegalize even a true hot cargo agreement. Present law forbids enforcing the agreement by a strike or picketing to induce a strike if the contracting employer declines to adhere to his agreement. This bill prohibits a strike or picketing to obtain entry into the agreement. Yet this bill goes even further and illegalizes the agreement even though it was not procured through a strike or picketing and even though no effort is made to enforce it by a strike or picketing. The bill thus outlaws an entirely voluntary compact with which the employer is perfectly happy to comply. Although his sympathy or interest may be entirely on the union's side, the employer is forbidden to contract on the basis of that sympathy or interest. The neutral employer is now compelled to side with the struck employer rather than the union, whether he likes it or not.

The far-reaching effect of this proposal is something on which there are no hearings. The conferees, and certainly no member of this body, have any idea how many labor agreements contain such provisions. Examples that come to my mind which would be banned by these provisions are as follows:

First. It would prevent a union from protecting the bargaining unit it represents by obtaining an agreement not to subcontract work normally performed by employees in the unit.

Second. Many industries, in addition to the garment trades are highly integrated, so that work proceeds from employer to employer in the process of manufacture. An agreement requiring subcontracted work to be performed under certain wage conditions would be illegal.

Third. It would prevent an agreement requiring employers to furnish union-made overalls and tools.

Fourth. A manufacturing plant which agrees not to subcontract alteration or repair work would be illegal.

Fifth. The agreement between the major coal producers and the mineworkers, pursuant to which the coal mine companies buy low-wage mined coal from substandard mines and sell it along with their own product would be banned.

The distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] fought very hard to get this agreement covered by way of an exemption in the bill.

All the intricate economic relationships by which organized employers with unions seek to maintain their competitive position from lower paying, unorganized employers would be jeopardized. The hot cargo agreement is illegal, whether express or implied in the course of doing business, for instance, by a department store which might, as a policy, purchase goods with union labels; if such policy were incorporated in its agreement with its union, would be illegal.

RECOGNITION AND ORGANIZATIONAL PICKETING—PRIMARY PEACEFUL PICKETING

I now turn to a discussion of recognition and organizational picketing. Two illustrations of organizational picketing, I think, ought to illustrate the point I want to make.

First. At P company, a small furniture manufacturing plant away from a city, the wages are relativey low and the workload high. Some employees want a union and seek aid from union X. Union X assigns an organizer and the campaign begins. P company learns about its employees' interest in the union and embarks on a widespread campaign against the union. Interviews with individual employees emphasize the benefits to be gained from staying nonunion. The union's campaign is "free speeched" to a standstill; the employees have become scared for their jobs. One of the union's leaders who has had low production records is discharged. Two others are laid off because of lack of work. Union X might file charges with the NLRB, and start the long and doubtful process of adjudicating the charge. It might be 3 years before P company is told to stop committing unfair labor practices. Under these circumstances, the union determines to picket for organizational purposes. It might dissuade P company from the campaign—it might give the employees courage to join. Is there any reason why such a picket line must be limited to 30 days; why the union must submit to an NLRB election which it will certainly lose?

On what grounds of fairness can this proposal be submitted? Organizational work is not tea party work. It is tough. It is important. The organizers use their economic rights to call the attention of the employees and of the public to the undesirable working conditions which prevail in some parts of the country. Is this a part of the scheme to keep some sections of the country unorganized, and thus do great competitive damage to employers in high labor standards States? I think so. I shall be no party to it.

The other case I want to raise is this: Powerful union T sends a letter to R, a small employer paying good wages, telling him of an organizational picket line which is about to be placed in front of his store. Deliveries are impeded, and after a brief period R tells union T that his employees want to be represented by T, and he wants to sign an agreement. Can there be any of us who can condone this situation? Of course not.

But the law which we are asked to enact is not drawn to differentiate between these situations. I certainly have grave misgivings about a law which further weakens union X, because union T has abused its power. Union T might have to find another way to gain its ends, but union X is even more helpless than it is now. The Senate is being asked to approve an unfair bill.

Let us look at some of the worst features of the ban on organizational picketing:

(a) It prevents picketing where another union is recognized. Existing law bans such picketing where a union is certified. Why this extension? Every union which wants protection from picketing can get certified except in the construction industry, and there such picketing is usually a work assignment dispute, subject to another section of the law. Why should the Federal Government protect a relationship upon which it has not placed its stamp of approval? Is it not likely that corrupt employees seeking a "sweetheart agreement" will welcome recognition of a Johnny Dio? Where has the crusade against corruption gone? My guess is that it has been sacrificed to the pressures of antiunion employers.

(b) The Senate bill contained a provision saying, in effect, that where the employer committed unfair labor practices, the union had a right to picket for organizational purposes. The bill now before us preserves an unimportant shred of this provision. Company union cases in violation of 8(a)(2) of the act are difficult to prove and constitute a small part of the Board's business. The important unfair labor practices in this context are antiunion threats and discriminatory discharges.

The House conferees insisted that a picket line protesting unfair labor practices would not be a violation of the antipicketing provisions of their bill. But why did they steadfastly refuse to say so in their bill? Everyone knows that protest picketing when the union has not gained recognition contains at least a substantial objective of promoting organization. In this connection, I refer to an analysis appearing on page 16490 of the RECORD. This analysis was inserted by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who was so active in advocating the provision now before us:

> The impact of this change (a suit for damages in addition to the unfair labor practice) is particularly serious in view of the fact that such picketing is prohibited if an object is recognition or organization. Few instances of picketing will be found where at least a remote objective of the union cannot be found to be related to recognition. * * * In addition, in the absence of clear legislative history showing a contrary intention, this provision might make it an unfair labor practice to picket against an employer's unfair labor practice in many instances, since frequently it may be found that organization is also an object.

I do not think my fears are groundless.

(c) The Senate bill provided the General Counsel with complete injunction power if he desired to utilize it. But if the equities of the situation suggested not using it, then he could allow the case to proceed by the use of normal administrative hearings. He might, for instance, have built up standards for not getting injunctions in the face of sweatshop conditions. The bill now before us is a further extension of the mandatory injunction device against labor. It is in some contrast to the fact that there are still no mandatory injunction proceedings against employers.

This bill makes it an unfair labor practice, in certain circumstances, for a union "to picket" or "threaten to picket" any employer where "an object thereof is forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization" or "forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective bargaining representative" unless certified.

One of the forbidden circumstances is "where within the preceding 12 months a valid election under section 9(c) of this act has been conducted." There are strong reasons why a union, even if it has lost the election, should not be prohibited from picketing for a full year after the election. As the joint committee observed in 1948—and among its members were Senator Taft and Representative Hartley—there "may be equities against it, the union, having to wait a whole year. The situation may arise where some action by the employer, or a more successful organizing campaign, causes the union to acquire an overwhelming majority within a few weeks following an election in which it has been rejected by the employees"—Senate Report No. 986, part 3, 80th Congress, 2d session, page 71.

I discussed this problem only a few minutes ago, in another connection, Mr. President.

I favor a time limitation; but I believe there should be included language which will permit an exception to be made to the time limitation, when it can be shown that, as a matter of fact, conditions in the plant have so changed—for example, because of some antilabor action by an employer—that the union should have the right to proceed to picket again.

Surely, the right of the employees to bargain collectively should not be forfeited for a year, regardless of the intervening circumstances.

The bill also prohibits picketing for recognition by a majority union for longer than 30 days, without filing a representation petition with the NLRB. This is true even if the union is overwhelmingly designated by the employees to represent them and the employer nevertheless declines to recognize it. The fundamental right to strike for recognition of a majority union is thus watered down to a right to strike for recognition only if the union also petitions for an election. Until today, recourse to the Board was an alternative to striking, not an indispensable adjunct of it.

"The act expressly preserves the right to strike, and that includes a strike for refusing to negotiate as well as any other. It is a remedy parallel with recourse to the Board"—N.L.R.B. v. Remington Rand, Inc., 94 F. 2d, 862, 871 (C.A. 2), certiorari denied, 304 U.S. 576.

As the Supreme Court has stated, where a company declined to recognize a union selected by its employees, "there is no reason why the employees, and their union under their authorization, may not, under section 13, strike, and, under section 7 peacefully picket the premises of their employer to induce it thus to recognize their chosen representative"—U.M.W. v. Arkansas Oak Flooring Co., 351 U.S. 62, 75.

But it is not simply that we fasten the right to strike with a bureaucracy. We enable the employer to exploit that bureaucratic procedure to escape the strike. Suppose that between the time that an election petition is filed and the time when an election is held, the employer engages in unfair labor practices and, as a result, dissipates the union's majority. The employer might fire the union leaders; he might threaten reprisals if the employees did not relinquish their union membership; he might promise wage increases, to rid himself of the union. If he succeeded by those means to cause the employees to defect, the union would lose its majority. Yet, in order to continue to strike for recognition, the union would have to submit to an election, in which it would be sure to lose; and its sure loss would be directly attributable to the employer's unfair labor practices. And, to avoid an election in which it would be sure to lose—and the loss of the election would mean forfeiture of the right to picket for either organizational or recognition purposes for a full year—the union would have to give up its strike for recognition. I cannot endorse a bill which empowers an employer to escape a strike for recognition, by engaging in unfair labor practices which succeed in dissipating the union's majority.

SPECIAL EXEMPTIONS

Mr. President, the last point I wish to make deals with a matter—and, Mr. President, I have a sense of humor about this—in regard to which I have been advised, by those who assure me they have my own best interests at heart, that it would be better if I did not discuss it. But, Mr. President, I am going to discuss it, because I have no right to take in conference a position which I am unwilling to take out in the open.

Mr. President, another reason why I voted against this proposed legislation is that I do not believe in class legislation; I do not believe in special legislation which singles out one group and applies to it one rule, but does not apply the same rule universally, to all like cases.

Mr. President, this measure involves proposals for two exemptions in the hot cargo provisions—one, for the garment industry; the other, for the building industry.

I think the operative fact situations in regard to those two industries demonstrate that this measure should include a section which would provide an exemption, not only for them, but also for all other industries which a court might find came under the same fact situations. But that is not done in this measure.

Mr. President, let me read that part, which is to be found on page 27:

> Provided further, That for the purposes of this subsection (e) and section 8(b)(4)(B) the terms "any employer", "any person engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce", and "any person" when used in relation to the terms "any other producer, processor, or manufacturer," "any other employer", or "any other person" shall not include persons in the relation of a jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or subcontractor working on the goods or premises of the jobber or manufacturer or performing parts of an integrated process of production in the apparel and clothing industry: Provided further, That nothing in this Act shall prohibit the enforcement of any agreement which is within the foregoing exception.

Mr. President, I offered a simple little amendment which would have made that provision universal of application. I suggested that the conferees strike out the words "the apparel and clothing industry" and substitute therefor the very clear little word "any", so as to make that part of the provision read as follows:

> a jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or subcontractor working on the goods or premises of the jobber or manufacturer or performing parts of an integrated process of production in any industry: Provided further, That nothing in this Act shall prohibit the enforcement of any agreement which is within the foregoing exception.

I also offered an amendment in the first proviso of section 8(e) which would have enlarged the effect of the building industry exemption to include other industries in like situations.

In the committee we got into quite a discussion about other industries which might fall into this category.

The distinguished Senator from West Virginia made what I regarded as a very powerful case in support of treating the coal cases as one exception. But I said to the conferees, "What difference does it make? I am willing to let the courts decide that. But I do not propose to vote for a piece of proposed legislation which singles out one particular group of workers and gives them special treatment."

Then the workers in that union would know it. Although I am sure their leadership does not appreciate the position I took in the committee, I happen to believe that the workers in that industry are entitled to the protection of the exemption; and I think that the workers in any other integrated industry likewise are entitled to it.

What is wrong with making it universal of application? If it is true that this is singular, then certainly there can be no reason for opposing my amendment, which would strike out the words to which I have referred and would insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "any industry".

Mr. President, let me state why I think the House conferees do not consider it singular. I wish to say, in behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from West Virginia, that they are willing to go along with my amendment.

But it took a majority, and I could not produce it. But when this was brought up for discussion in committee, Mr. President, the chairman of the House conferees, Mr. BARDEN, made perfectly clear that he would go along with it only if it was limited to the garment industry. Well, when he took that position, he lost me.

Mr. President, my position is well known by my colleagues in the Senate. This is no new position for the Senator from Oregon.

In 1943 I resigned from the War Labor Board because a decision was rendered by a majority of my colleagues, when a strike gun was held at the head of the workers of this country in the midst of a war that set up one set of standards for one group of workers which was not applicable to the rest of the workers in America. I said then, as I say today on the floor of the Senate, that principle cannot be reconciled with uniform justice in America.

I want to say, Mr. President, for my own protection, in case anyone raises any question as to my consistency, the statement that there, too, I proposed the words "any industry" that meets the terms and conditions of the factual situation in mind.

Mr. President, I favored a change for the building industry in the secondary boycott section because I attempted to utilize the experience of the Board during the past 12 years and to rectify several of the situations which I believe needed changing. The garment industry and the construction industry on this basis have demonstrated to me the need for these revisions in the secondary boycott field. I included a third proviso covering two enterprises which are substantially under similar control.

My objection to singling out industries in the conference bill was related primarily to the hot-cargo issue. Here is a new and far-reaching notion in the law which would ban a union and a company from stating conditions upon which the company would do business with other companies. The number of industries which will be affected by this new proviso are incalculable, and it would have been a serious injustice to have taken care of the problems of one industry, which was relatively integrated, without taking care of other industries with similar problems of integration.

CONCLUSION

I now close by saying that I really never like to take as much time as I have taken today in presenting my position on an issue; but, Mr. President, I owed it to myself and to my supporters to present this detailed analysis of the conference report, setting forth my objections to it. I shall be perfectly willing to be judged by my opposition to this conference report bill for the various reasons I have set out this afternoon, because these are honest convictions of mine, and I am satisfied that the legal objections which I have raised to the labor-management bill will stand up in the courts of America.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

During the delivery of Mr. MORSE's remarks—

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia rose.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] would like to have me yield momentarily so that he may make a brief statement. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator, with the understanding that his remarks will be printed in the RECORD following mine, and with the further understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I am very grateful to my delightful friend from Oregon for yielding to me.

I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia, who served on the conference committee and who, I think, performed excellently in behalf of his constituents and in behalf of the people of the country at large.

My able colleague from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] has performed distinguished service as one of the managers on the part of the Senate during conference committee consideration of the labor-management reform legislation. Having been the recipient of many of the same communications and others similar to those which I know my colleague received, on both sides of the major questions before the conference, I had a keen awareness that his was a difficult task.

But the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] carried with him into the conference a demonstrated record of fairness during the 14 years he served as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor in the House of Representatives. Over and over again he was associated with the framing of proposals and the debate which brought forth progressive labor-management legislation of real benefit in the improvement of employer-employee bargaining and relations generally.

Coming to the Senate, my West Virginia colleague properly sought membership on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of this body and was appropriately rewarded with service in that capacity.

My colleague [Mr. RANDOLPH] has consistently carried into the deliberations of the committee and of the Senate the qualities of objectivity with which he has been richly endowed.

While his honorable record of service in behalf of the causes of the working people has long been recognized, my discerning colleague is also known to be one who is fair to management, being fully cognizant of the problems of the employers as well as the problems of the workers.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] did the expected as a member of the Senate-House conference committee on the differing versions of labor-management reform legislation; namely, he accepted the responsibilities and the challenges of the assignment by participating regularly and faithfully in all sessions of the conference through the 12 days of tedious and trying negotiations.

I join West Virginians generally in expressing appreciation for my colleague's fidelity, for his belief in and practice of the art of the possible through honest compromise, and for his outstanding ability to quietly help bring harmony and cooperation into focus at times when tensions and discord seemed to be insurmountable disruptive influences.

Mr. President, I know that my distinguished colleague signed the conference report and the senior Senator from Oregon did not sign the conference report. Nevertheless, my colleague [Mr. RANDOLPH] has complimented the senior Senator from Oregon in talking to me, and my colleague has told me that the senior Senator from Oregon has at all times acted in the strength of his convictions and with the utmost of sincerity. I take this opportunity, therefore, while I have the floor, to salute my friend from Oregon for his steadfast faithfulness and loyalty to his convictions. I compliment him for the great work he has done in the Senate.

I thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding to me in order that I might say these things which have been in my heart concerning my true friend and beloved colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. MORSE. I want to say to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], I am glad he made the comments he did about his colleague [Mr. RANDOLPH]. I want him to know also that I appreciate the kind words he saw fit to speak of me.

What I have said about the chairman of the conference and the members of the conference on both sides of the table is equally applicable to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and to the other individual members of the conference.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that the American people were served on the conference committee by a group of public servants who sought to do the very best their judgment dictated to them in the interest of promoting the public interest.

I said earlier, and I now repeat in this reference to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], my differences with him are sincere, honest differences of value judgment as to the merits of the conference report. There is no doubt about the fact, Mr. President, that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], as well as our other colleagues, deserves the sincere thanks of the Senate for the dedicated public service performed throughout the conference.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS ON HUNTLEY RECLAMATION PROJECT, TO SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 24

Mr. KENNEDY obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that the Chair may lay before the Senate amendments of the House to a Senate bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate S. 53 with amendments adopted by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 53) to amend the acts approved April 16 and July 27, 1906 (34 Stat. 116 and 519), so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands on the Huntley reclamation project, Yellowstone County, Mont., to school district numbered 24, Huntley Project Schools, Yellowstone County, Mont., which were, on page 1, line 5, after "shall" insert ", upon payment of $115 to the United States,"; on page 2, line 4, strike out "and"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the acts approved April 16 and June 27, 1906 (34 Stat. 116 and 519), so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands on the Huntley reclamation project, Yellowstone County, Mont., to school district numbered 24, Huntley Project Schools, Yellowstone County, Mont."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The major point involved is the payment of $115 by the Huntley School District to the United States, which is regarded as a fair market value of the land involved.

A discussion of the situation appears on page 17424 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 29, 1959. Both Senators from Montana concur in the House amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 213) to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 218 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2906) to extend the period for filing claims for credit or refund of overpayments of income taxes arising as a result of renegotiation of Government contracts.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2411) to amend paragraph 1629 of the Tariff Act of 1930 so as to provide for the free importation of tourist literature.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CAPE COD NATIONAL SEASHORE PARK

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to establish Cape Cod National Seashore Park.

This bill is the outgrowth of many months of study by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] and myself in association with Representative KEITH. All of us have had personal associations with the Cape, and all of us have been conscious of the concerns which have been expressed by individual citizens in Cape Cod communities. Each of us has felt that a national park on Cape Cod was justified only on a strong showing that this was the most effective means of maintaining the historic way of life and scenic integrity of the Cape. We have examined the proposals which were put forth by the National Park Service critically and have discussed them with leading authorities on park legislation, as well as with many citizens. We have become increasingly convinced that this is a proposal which is fully worthy of national legislation and that it does incorporate values and objectives which are deserving of future protection and preservation in a national park. We are persuaded that through a bill incorporating the principles contained in this legislation, it is possible to preserve the Cape and to provide an environment attractive to future generations from all parts of the Commonwealth and the Nation.

It is not necessary to rehearse in this body the range of our national needs for increased recreational and cultural opportunities during the next decades. We pride ourselves as a nation that we have been able to create unprecedented opportunities for leisure and education. Many of our people now or soon will be able to devote as much time to activities of their own choice as to their occupations, yet we have been very slow as a nation to adapt our public policies so as to improve the quality and breadth of recreational experience for the Nation. Yet we are aware of the increasingly narrow margin which still exists—especially in the East—for national park development. Nowhere is this more evident than on the Atlantic coast, which possesses a large proportion of our largest urban concentrations. It is imperative that as a nation we seize those clear opportunities which remain and not allow a proposal such as the Cape Cod Park—based upon careful professional judgment and experience—to become stalemated and ultimately destroyed in barren controversy or unfulfilled hope.

By any standard, it seems to both the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] and myself and to most of the citizens and public leaders in Massachusetts from whom we have heard that lower Cape Cod presents such an opportunity. We know of no alternative or subsequent park development in Massachusetts which could provide the citizens of the Commonwealth and the national public with such a rich and varied blend of scenic, recreational, and scientific values.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts and I feel strongly that the Cape Cod proposal deserves separate legislative attention and passage. Though the Cape Cod seashore is obviously related in purpose to other proposals now pending or contemplated for other seashore areas, we are convinced that there are several important special features in the Lower Cape which make it highly desirable that the committees of Congress have an opportunity to consider this proposal on its own merits and in its own setting. Moreover, seashore park legislation is a relatively new field of legislation, in which there is not a large reservoir of experience or precedent. We do not suggest that the Cape Cod Park is the only seashore area which deserves early attention. We merely suggest that each of the areas should be considered and analyzed on their own terms, rather than being made a part of an omnibus bill which vests wide latitude in the executive branch in the selection of park areas and lands.

Cape Cod is more heavily settled, enjoys more compact town government, and has a greater degree of development than most previous park areas. It lacks none of the natural beauty and scenic splendor which characterize most of the national parks, but it is not an unsettled wilderness or forest area. Particularly since there are residents whose roots on the Cape reach back far into the past, it seems important to adapt a bill in such a way as to meet the legitimate interests and sentiments of existing residents. We have therefore designated in more detail than is traditional in park legislation, the most exact possible boundaries of the Park and made several provisions which afford a method by which the threat of residential property condemnation can be eliminated by local action and which maintain a secure tax and development base for the six towns which lie within the diagram of the Park.

In a bill of this sort in which we are trying to achieve a new method of park establishment and operation and in which we are entering some uncharted areas of park legislation, it seems to us particularly necessary to have local hearings and to attempt to draw upon the concrete evidence of local officials and citizens. This bill represents, in our judgment, a sound and balanced basis for the establishment of this Park, but in several matters of detail we shall want to keep an open mind. From hearings we can derive a more precise evaluation of the economic impact of this Park and the growth needs of the communities. Both the senior Senator from Massachusetts and I feel that the provisions regarding future residential growth within the Park and the provisions for in-lieu tax payments by the Federal Government need special scrutiny in the light of evidence which local communities and objective outside experts are able to present at hearings both on the Cape and in Washington.

We believe that this bill which is uniquely designed for Cape Cod does properly harmonize the National, State, and private interests which are involved in a venture of this nature. We believe that it provides every reasonable protection to the private residential landowner and that it brings the Park within realistic financial means for the Federal Government. Even as we attempt to capitalize on a great national asset, we shall under this bill be able to provide the individual Cape resident with a secure future and with a clear knowledge of what are his rights and responsibilities within the Park.

There are several features of this bill which are worthy of special mention:

First. Each residential landowner is given a minimum guarantee of electing either life occupancy or occupancy for 25 years.

Second. In any of the six towns which adopt zoning meeting standards defined by the Secretary of the Interior, all homeowners in those towns whose property lies within the diagram of the Park are assured of the right to continue to own and occupy their home without interruption or interference so long as the zoning is kept in force.

Third. In order to accommodate the possible growth and revenue needs of towns with land in the Park there is provision for setting aside in the future an acreage up to 10 percent of the total private land in each town which falls within the Park for new homebuilding on the condition that such property is subjected to acceptable zoning.

Fourth. There is an in-lieu tax provision to give the towns a shock absorber in the event that there is a dip in tax revenue as a result of acquisition of private property in fee simple by the Federal Government.

Fifth. This bill establishes an Advisory Commission which will have substantial influence in setting the policies governing the establishment of the Park and its future administration. We have written this bill in the greatest possible detail and provided a full section-by-section analysis in order to give each citizen the best possible comprehension of the effects which this Park will have on their lives and on the future of Cape Cod itself.

Again and again during our preparation of this bill over the past months, we have tried to keep in mind the rational core for the establishment of this Park. It is all too easy to allow a proposal of this sort to become a victim of exaggerated fears. We have tried to set this proposal in the perspective of history and against the knowledge that an enterprise of this sort is precisely the kind of activity which characterizes a free people. We are confident that as a result of the protections which are clearly written into the law and the spirit which we know animated both the authors of the original proposal and of this legislation, that it will be possible to establish a great national park in an area which may otherwise be increasingly blighted by the relentless and sweeping advance of commercial development. If a park of this nature is not established on Cape Cod, there is every danger that much of the Cape will become a mere extension of the suburban civilization which typifies so many of our lives. If we act sensibly now, while the opportunity remains, we shall have preserved for America and for our people a priceless heritage to be enjoyed many times over, not only by this generation but by those which follow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The bill (S. 2636) to provide for the establishment of Cape Cod National Seashore Park, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. SALTONSTALL), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the coastal and shoreline area on Cape Cod, Massachusetts, possesses unique cultural, scenic, historic, scientific, and recreational values; and

Whereas these values are an important and irreplaceable part of the heritage of the United States; and

Whereas these values should be preserved and enhanced for the benefit and inspiration of all of the people of the United States of present and future generations; and

Whereas an adequate and representative portion of Cape Cod should be set aside and developed to assure its unimpaired use and enjoyment for varied cultural, scenic, historic, scientific, and recreational purposes: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the area comprising that portion of the land and waters located in the towns of Provincetown, Truro, Wellfleet, Eastham, Orleans, and Chatham in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and described in subsection (b), is designated for establishment as Cape Cod National Seashore Park (hereinafter referred to as "the park").

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as "Secretary") is authorized to acquire by purchase, gift, condemnation, transfer from any Federal agency, exchange, or otherwise, the land, waters, and other property, and improvements thereon and any interest therein, within the area which is described in section 1 of this Act or which lies within the boundaries of the park as established under section 3 of this Act (hereinafter referred to as "such area"). Any property, or interest therein, owned by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by any of the towns referred to in section 1 of this Act or by any other political subdivision of said Commonwealth may be acquired only with the concurrence of such owner. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Federal property located within such area may, with the concurrence of the agency having custody thereof, be transferred without consideration to the administrative jurisdiction of the Secretary for use by him in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

(b) In exercising his authority to acquire property in accordance with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall have authority to incur obligations and enter into contracts involving the expenditure of funds authorized by section 11 of this Act for the acquisition of property and his action in doing so shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof and such funds shall be deemed to have been expended when so obligated.

(c) The Secretary is authorized (1) to use donated and appropriated funds in making acquisitions under this Act, and (2) to pay therefor not more than the fair market value of any acquisitions which he makes by purchase under this Act.

(d) In exercising his authority to acquire property by exchange, the Secretary may accept title to any non-Federal property located within such area and convey to the grantor of such property any federally owned property under the jurisdiction of the Secretary within such area. The properties so exchanged shall be approximately equal in fair market value, provided that the Secretary may accept cash from or pay cash to the grantor in such an exchange in order to equalize the values of the properties exchanged.

(e) As used in this Act the term "fair market value" shall mean the fair market value as determined by the Secretary and may be based on an independent appraisal obtained by him.

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary is authorized to dispose of any buildings or structures acquired by him under this Act with respect to which no private right of use and occupancy exists, upon such terms and conditions, and with or without publicly advertising for bids, as he may deem to be in the interest of the United States.

SEC. 3. (a) As soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act and following the acquisition by the Secretary of not less than a total of six thousand acres of the area described in section 1 of this Act, which acreage is in the opinion of the Secretary efficiently administrable to carry out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary shall establish Cape Cod National Seashore Park and shall declare such establishment by the publication of notice thereof in the Federal Register.

(b) Such notice referred to in subsection (a) of this section shall contain a detailed description of the boundaries of the park which shall encompass an area as nearly as practicable identical to the area described in section 1 of this Act. The Secretary shall forthwith after the date of publication of such notice in the Federal Register (1) send a copy of such notice, together with a map showing such boundaries, by registered mail to the Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and to the board of selectmen of each of the towns referred to in section 1 of this Act; (2) cause a copy of such notice and map to be published in one or more newspapers which circulate in each of such towns; and (3) cause a certified copy of such notice, a copy of such map, and a copy of this Act to be recorded at the Registry of Deeds for Barnstable County, Massachusetts.

SEC. 4. (a) Any owner or owners (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as "owner") of improved property on the date of its acquisition by the Secretary may, as a condition to such acquisition, retain the right of use and occupancy of his property for noncommercial residential purposes, for a term not to exceed twenty-five years or for a term ending at the death of such owner, whichever term he shall elect. In any case where such an owner retains a right of use and occupancy for such a fixed term of years, such right may during its existence be conveyed or leased, in whole, but not in part, for noncommercial residential purposes. The Secretary shall pay to the owner the fair market value of the property on the date of such acquisition less the fair market value on such date of the right retained by the owner.

(b)(1) The Secretary's authority to acquire property by condemnation shall be suspended with respect to all improved property located in all of the towns referred to in section 1 of this Act for one year following the date of its enactment.

(2) Thereafter such authority shall be suspended with respect to all improved property in any of such towns during all times when such town shall have in force and applicable to such property a duly adopted, valid zoning bylaw approved by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of this Act.

(c) The Secretary's authority to acquire property by condemnation shall be suspended with respect to any particular property which is used for commercial or industrial purposes during any periods when such use is permitted by the Secretary and during the pendency of the first application for such permission made to the Secretary after the date of enactment of this Act provided such application is made not later than the date of establishment of the park.

(d) As used in this Act, the term "improved property" shall mean a private noncommercial dwelling, including the land on which it is situated, whose construction was begun before September 1, 1959, and structures accessory thereto (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as "dwelling") together with such amount and locus of the property adjoining and in the same ownership as such dwelling as the Secretary designates to be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of such dwelling for the sole purpose of noncommercial residential use and occupancy. In making such designation the Secretary shall take into account the manner of noncommercial residential use and occupancy in which the dwelling and such adjoining property has usually been enjoyed by its owner or occupant. The amount of such adjoining property to be so designated by the Secretary shall in no case be less than three acres in area, or all of such lesser amount as there may be, except that the Secretary may exclude from the amount of adjoining property so designated any beach or waters, together with so much of the land adjoining such beach or waters as the Secretary may deem necessary for public access thereto.

SEC. 5. (a) It is the policy of the Congress that a reasonable amount of additional noncommercial residential development be permitted on property located within the park: Provided, That any particular such development would not, in the opinion of the Secretary, adversely affect or interfere with the preservation, development, and administration of such area for the purposes referred to in section 1 of this Act: And provided further, That such property is subject to a zoning bylaw approved by the Secretary, in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall, in conformity with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, upon request made to him not later than five years after the date of enactment of this Act pursuant to any lawful vote of a town meeting of any town referred to in section 1 of this Act, which vote has been ratified by the Advisory Commission established by section 10 of this Act, designate in such town an amount of unimproved property for such development which, together with any previous such designations made by him for such town, shall not exceed in acreage 10 per centum of the total amount of privately owned property situated within the boundaries of the park and in such town. The authority of the Secretary to acquire by condemnation property so designated shall be suspended from the date of such designation during all times when such property is subject to such a zoning bylaw.

SEC. 6. (a) As soon as practicable following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall issue regulations specifying standards for approval by him of town zoning bylaws for purposes of sections 4 and 5 of this Act. Any such bylaw which meets such standards shall be approved by the Secretary upon application made to him for such approval.

(b) Any zoning bylaw approved in accordance with subsection (a) of this section shall contribute to the effect of (1) prohibiting the commercial and industrial use, other than any commercial or industrial use which is permitted by the Secretary, of all property within the boundaries of the Park which is situated within the town adopting such bylaw; and (2) promoting the preservation and development, in accordance with the purposes of section 1 of this Act, of the area comprising the park, by means of acreage, frontage, and setback requirements and other provisions which may be required by such regulations to be included in the zoning bylaw consistent with the laws of Massachusetts.

(c) No zoning bylaw shall be approved by the Secretary which (1) contains any provision which he may consider adverse to the preservation and development, in accordance with the purposes of section 1 of this Act, of the area comprising the park, or (2) fails to make provision for the Secretary to receive notice of any variance granted under and any exception made to the application of such bylaw, and notice of any amendment thereof.

(d) If any improved property, with respect to which the Secretary's authority to acquire by condemnation has been suspended in accordance with the provisions of the Act, is made the subject of a variance under or an exception to any zoning bylaw applicable to such improved property so as to exempt it from any applicable standards contained in regulations issued pursuant to this section, the Secretary may, in his discretion, at any time after the date when such exception is made terminate the suspension of his authority to acquire such improved property by condemnation.

SEC. 7. The Secretary shall furnish to any interested person requesting the same, a certificate indicating with respect to any property located within the park as to which the Secretary's authority to acquire such property by condemnation has been suspended in accordance with the provisions of this Act that such authority has been so suspended and the reasons therefor.

SEC. 8. (a) In order to provide compensation for tax losses sustained by the towns referred to in section 1 of this Act as a result of certain acquisitions by the Secretary of privately owned real estate and improvements thereon pursuant to the provisions of this Act, payments in lieu of taxes shall be made to each such town in which such real estate is located, and which has been authorized, under the laws of Massachusetts, to assess taxes upon real estate to the person who is in possession thereof and to assess taxes upon any present interest in real estate to the owner of such interest, in accordance with the following schedule: For the calendar year in which the real estate is acquired in fee simple absolute, an amount which bears the same proportion to the full amount of tax assessed thereon in such year as the number of days remaining in such year after the date of acquisition bears to the number three hundred and sixty-five. In any case where an amount in excess of the difference between such proportionate amount and such full amount has already been paid to the town by or on behalf of the owner or owners from whom the real estate was so acquired, payment of such excess amount shall be made as reimbursement to such owner or owners out of such proportionate amount and only the balance remaining of such proportionate amount shall be paid to the town. For the two succeeding calendar years there shall be paid on account of such real estate an amount equal to the full amount of tax assessed thereon in the year of acquisition.

(b) No payments in lieu of taxes shall be made on account of real estate and improvements thereon in which the Secretary has ever acquired less than a fee simple absolute under this Act.

(c) As soon as practicable after real estate taxes have been assessed by such towns in each calendar year, the Secretary shall compute and certify the amount of payments in lieu of taxes due to each of such towns, and such amounts shall be paid to the respective towns by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

(d) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any property acquired by the Secretary after December 31 of the twenty-fifth year following the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 9. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the property acquired by the Secretary under this Act shall be administered by the Secretary, subject to the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes", approved August 25, 1916 (30 Stat. 535); as amended and supplemented, and in accordance with laws of general application relating to the national park system as defined by the Act of August 8, 1953 (67 Stat. 496); except that authority otherwise available to the Secretary for the conservation and management of natural resources may be utilized to the extent he finds such authority will further the purposes of this Act.

(b) (1) The Secretary shall develop for recreational uses such portions of Cape Cod National Seashore Park as he deems especially adaptable for such uses, including camping, swimming, horseback riding, boating, sailing, hunting, fishing, and other recreational activities of similar nature. Except for such recreational development and except for improved property therein, the park shall be permanently reserved as a primitive wilderness and no development of the park or plan for the convenience of visitors shall be undertaken by the Secretary which would be incompatible with the preservation of the unique flora and fauna or the physiographic conditions now prevailing in the area described in section 1 of this Act.

(2) In developing the park the Secretary shall, so far as practicable consistent with the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, provide recreational and other facilities for the public in such places and manner as he determines will not diminish for its owners or occupants the value or enjoyment of any improved property located within the park.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, land and waters now or hereafter included in any migratory bird refuge within the boundaries of the park shall continue as such refuge under applicable laws and regulations, but such lands and waters shall be a part of the park and shall be administered by the Secretary for recreational uses not inconsistent with the purposes of such refuge under such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. Nothing in this Act shall limit the power of the Secretary to acquire lands and waters for any migratory bird refuge.

(d) The Secretary may permit hunting and fishing, including shellfishing, on lands and waters under his jurisdiction within the park under such regulations as he may prescribe. The Secretary shall consult with officials of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and any political subdivision thereof who have jurisdiction of hunting and fishing, including shellfishing, prior to the issuance of any such regulations, and the Secretary is authorized to enter into cooperative arrangements with such officials regarding such hunting and fishing, including shellfishing, as he may deem desirable, except that the Secretary shall leave the regulation of the taking of shellfish to the towns referred to in section 1 of this Act.

SEC. 10. (a) There is hereby established a Cape Cod National Seashore Park Advisory Commission (hereinafter referred to as the Commission).

(b) The Commission shall be composed of nine members appointed by the Secretary as follows:

(1) six members to be appointed from recommendations made by each of the boards of selectmen of the towns referred to in the first section of this Act, one member from the recommendations made by each such board;

(2) two members to be appointed from recommendations of the Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and

(3) one member to be designated by the Secretary.

(c) The Secretary shall designate one member to be Chairman. Any vacancy in the Commission shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(d) A member of the Commission shall serve without compensation as such and shall serve at the pleasure of the official or officials recommending his appointment. The Secretary is authorized to pay the expenses reasonably incurred by the Commission in carrying out its responsibilities under this Act upon vouchers signed by the Chairman.

(e) The Commission established by this section shall act and advise by affirmative vote of a majority of the members thereof.

(f) The Secretary or his designee shall, from time to time, consult with the members of the Commission with respect to matters relating to the development of Cape Cod National Seashore Park, and shall consult with the members with respect to carrying out the provisions of sections 4, 5, and 6 of this Act.

(g) No permit for the commercial or industrial use of property located within the park shall be issued by the Secretary without the advice of the Commission.

SEC. 11. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act; except that no more than $15,000,000 shall be appropriated for the acquisition of land and waters and improvements thereon, and interests therein, and incidental costs relating thereto, in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(b) Any revenues received by the United States as a result of the disposal by the Secretary of any building or structure, or part thereof, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (f) of section 2 of this Act, shall be deposited in a special fund which the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish within the Treasury. All sums deposited in that fund shall be available to the Secretary of the Interior for disbursement by him in acquiring land and waters and improvements thereon, and interests therein, and in paying incidental costs relating thereto, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and shall be disbursed upon certification by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 12. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this Act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield to my colleague, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] to comment on this Cape Cod National Seashore Park bill.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I am glad to join with my colleague in introducing this bill. We have worked upon it together, and we believe that it is in satisfactory form in which to have it considered by the many persons who will be interested in it.

In addition to endorsing the statement which my colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], has just made on behalf of both of us, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD immediately following our remarks an explanation of the bill. The explanation serves also to explain the identical companion bill which Representative HASTINGS KEITH has introduced today in the other body. Representative KEITH represents the Massachusetts Ninth District which includes Cape Cod.

Also, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, after the explanation of our bill, the following papers which I believe will be helpful to all Senators who are interested in acquainting themselves about the Cape Cod area and its way of life, as an aid to considering our bill.

First, a copy of the text of a summary of the Cape Code National Seashore proposal by the National Park Service.

Second, a copy of the text of a Fish and Wildlife Service leaflet about Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge on Cape Cod.

Third, a brief bibliography of selected references about Cape Cod which we have had prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF S. 2636; H.R. 9050—A COMPANION BILL TO ESTABLISH CAPE COD NATIONAL SEASHORE PARK

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the establishment of Cape Cod National Seashore Park so that Lower Cape Cod may be preserved in substantially its present condition for the benefit of all the people of the United States of present and future generations.

The authors of the bill know from long personal experience as well as many years of official responsibility that Lower Cape Cod cannot be considered solely as a geographical area with certain physical characteristics. The Lower Cape must also be viewed as a way of life—a culture—which though conditioned by its environment finds its essence in the people who have lived and are living there. This bill seeks to preserve the way of life which these people have established and maintained on the Cape.

PREAMBLE

The preamble declares the reasons for establishing Cape Cod National Seashore Park. It states that Cape Cod possesses unique cultural, scenic, historic, scientific and recreational values; that these values are an important and irreplaceable part of America's heritage; that these values should be preserved and enhanced for the benefit and inspiration of all Americans of present and future generations; and that an adequate and representative portion of Cape Cod should be set aside and developed to assure its unimpaired use and enjoyment for varied cultural, scenic, historic, scientific, and recreational purposes.

SECTION 1

Section 1 describes the area in the towns of Provincetown, Truro, Wellfleet, Eastham, Orleans, and Chatham designated for establishment as Cape Cod National Seashore Park by running its boundaries in terms of principal geographic features.

The bill's description of the area to be included in the Park is a much more precise specification than has characteristically been provided in legislation establishing a national park or seashore area. Lower Cape Cod is very much more highly developed than most areas which have been the subject of past park laws, and therefore the sponsors believe that this legislation should specify in detail, especially for the benefit of people who live and own property on the Cape, what area is to be included in the Park. Since the exact boundaries of the Park will have to be established from surveys which cannot be completed before a Cape Cod National Seashore Park bill is enacted by the Congress, the exact final description of the Park's boundaries must necessarily be left to the Secretary of the Interior, as is provided in section 3 of the bill.

Broadly speaking, the bill would include in the Park substantially the same area proposed by the National Park Service in its field investigation report on the Cape Cod National Seashore proposal. In this connection it should be noted that the Park Service is an experienced, professional organization. The proposal which it has made is based on extensive field studies and careful analysis of the Lower Cape area and reflects over 40 years, since its establishment in 1916, of responsible performance by the Park Service in the planning establishment, and administration of national park areas.

There are four differences in area between the original Park Service proposal and this bill. These have been made after consultation with and upon the advice of the Park Service. They are as follows:

Provincetown

The bill would exclude one small area of approximately 67 acres which is included in the Park Service proposal. The area excluded is triangle shaped and located approximately one-half mile south of Oak Head. It is bounded westerly and northerly by boundaries of the Province Lands Reservation and southeasterly by U.S. Route 6. The exclusion of this area from the bill is designed to conform the boundaries of the Park to that of the Province Lands Reservation which is already in public ownership by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Eastham

The bill would add an area of approximately 193 acres which was not included in the Park Service proposal. The area added by the bill is the westerly shore of Salt Pond Bay to Snow Point bounded westerly by a line running in a southerly direction paralleling the general alinement of U.S. Route 6 and generally one-tenth of a mile to the east of U.S. Route 6 to a small stream approximately one-tenth of a mile beyond Governor Prence Road extended; thence southeasterly along the stream and continuing to the Orleans-Eastham town line.

The above-described area has been added so that the entire shoreline of Salt Pond Bay will be included within the Park. There is no logical basis for excluding a portion of this shoreline area of which the Park Service proposal incorporated the northerly portion. It is all excellent property for park purposes.

Chatham

Harding Beach, which was included in the Park Service proposal, is omitted from the bill. Since Harding Beach is rather remotely and inaccessibly located in relation to the rest of the Park area, added administrative and financial burdens might be posed were it to be included in the Park. Furthermore, this beach is now managed by the town of Chatham for the benefit of the public.

Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge, which was not included in the Park Service proposal, is included in the bill. Since the Refuge is already under the administration of the Fish and Wildlife Service in the Department of the Interior; since the Refuge is suitable for certain recreational activities, such as fishing, swimming, hiking, camping, shell collecting, picnicking, photography, and bird watching; and since the Refuge area is geographically proximate to and will, according to geologic forecasts, eventually be connected with the southerly extremity of Nauset Beach, it seems highly desirable to include the Refuge within the boundaries of the Park. It is the intention of the bill, as reflected in subsection 9(c), to preserve the separate identity of the Refuge and to have it administered for only such recreational purposes as will not interfere with its principal purpose as a wildlife refuge. Certain portions of Morris Island might be incorporated in Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge for administration on the same terms, and a portion would be used as access to the Refuge.

The total acreage embraced within the diagram of the Park in this bill is substantially the same as the Park Service proposal. This is without reference to Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge, since the refuge would merely be shifted from its present Federal jurisdiction into the Park.

SECTION 2

This section confers authority on the Secretary of the Interior to acquire property for the Park and makes provision for the way in which the authority shall be exercised. It also makes provision for the Secretary to dispose of buildings or structures which he acquires.

Neither the designation in section 1 of the bill of the area to be included in the Park nor the direction given to the Secretary of the Interior in section 3 to establish Cape Cod National Seashore Park constitute or require a taking from present owners of any of the property in the area so designated. The designation and establishment of a certain bounded area as a national seashore park has in itself no legal consequence for the owners of property located within such area. Any Federal control over such property can be exercised only after the property or some interest therein has been acquired by the Department of the Interior pursuant to authority conferred by Congress.

Subsection (a) provides authority for the Secretary of the Interior to acquire property within the area designated by section 1 for inclusion in the Park or which lies within the boundaries of the Park as established. The discussion under section 3 explains why there may be minor differences between the area described in section 1 of the bill and the area within the boundaries of the Park. Since there is a possibility of some difference, it is necessary that the Secretary's authority to acquire property be made applicable to both areas.

The Secretary's acquisition authority includes purchase, receipt of gifts, condemnation, transfer from any Federal agency and exchange as to all the lands, waters, and other property and improvements thereon, and any interest therein. Property owned by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by any town or by any other political subdivision of Massachusetts may be acquired only with the concurrence of the Commonwealth or town as the case may be. Transfer by a Federal agency is authorized in such a way as to avoid the necessity of following all of the usual, often time-consuming, procedures generally applicable to transfer of property by one Federal agency to another and without the necessity of any payment therefor by the Department of the Interior.

Subsection (b) gives the Secretary of the Interior authority to contract for the acquisition of property in such manner as to bind the Federal Government to pay the costs contracted for in the absence of previously appropriated funds. This authority is limited to run against only funds authorized for acquisition of property by subsection 11(a) of the bill. It is deemed important for the Secretary to have such contract authority so that he may negotiate the acquisition of property for the Park as expeditiously and economically as possible.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Secretary to use both donated and appropriated funds in making property acquisitions for the Park and to pay not more than the fair market value for acquisitions made by purchase.

Subsection (d) explains how the Secretary may exercise his authority to acquire property by exchange. He may accept title to non-Federal property located within the Park area in exchange for property which has already been acquired by him within the Park and where necessary equalize the value of the properties exchanged by accepting cash from or paying cash to the owner of the non-Federal property in such an exchange. The purpose of this provision is to make it possible for a property owner within the Park who wishes to stay in the Park, but to change his location therein, to do so, assuming there is Park property which the Secretary is willing to exchange with him. Furthermore, with this authority the Secretary may be able to use one piece of property which he has already acquired to buy another piece of property which he may deem more important for the Park. In short, the provision of such exchange authority adds flexibility to the Secretary's ability to acquire property and at the same time to accommodate individuals who wish to remain in the Park area.

Subsection (e) defines "fair market value" so as to permit the Secretary to determine such value and to obtain and use independent appraisals as a basis for determining such value for purposes of acquisitions by purchase—subsection 2(c); acquisitions by exchange—subsection 2(b); and acquisitions where the owner reserves a right of use and occupancy—subsection 4(a).

Subsection (f) authorizes the Secretary to dispose of buildings and structures which he acquires, as to which no retained right of use and occupancy exists, without having to comply with the general laws governing sale of Government property. Although the authors of this bill recognize that the interest of the Government is usually best served by disposing of Government property in sales by public competitive bidding, they believe that many of the buildings and structures which may be acquired by the Secretary in the Park area will have unique historical or other values which might not be suitably reflected or protected in such sales. Moreover many of such acquisitions may be made by gift to the United States or by using donated funds. Therefore it is desirable and proper to give the Secretary authority to dispose of buildings and structures acquired by him upon whatever terms and in whatever manner he deems to be in the interest of the United States.

Subsection (a) requires the Secretary of the Interior to establish Cape Cod National Seashore Park as soon as practicable after the enactment of the bill and after he has acquired at least 6,000 acres which may be efficiently administered for the purposes of the Park. Theoretically, it would be possible for the Secretary to establish the Park immediately after the enactment of the bill. However, merely hanging the label Cape Cod National Seashore Park on the proposed area could have no legal significance; hence, the requirement that the Secretary shall have at least 6,000 acres before establishing the park. With 6,000 acres in hand the Park Service would have enough land, subject to its being efficiently administrable, to start providing recreational and other facilities and to satisfy public expectations of a "going park."

Because of the bill's inclusion of Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge within the Park area (see discussion under sec. 1 above), the Secretary will immediately on the enactment of the bill have 3,500 acres toward the 6,000-acre minimum. There is reason to expect that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will transfer to the United States the Province Lands Reservation in Provincetown and Pilgrim Spring State Park in Truro. Certain private land and cash donations are also anticipated. Accordingly, the authors of this bill anticipate that it will be possible for Cape Cod National Seashore Park to be established shortly after its enactment.

Subsection (b) provides that the boundaries of the Park, when it is established by the Secretary, shall encompass as nearly as practicable the same area described in section 1. While it will not be possible as of the date of enactment of the bill to specify exactly what the boundaries of the Park will be, because necessary final surveys will not be undertaken by the Park Service until after legislation has been approved, this provision is designed to give assurance that the area of the Park as established will be substantially the identical area as that which the Congress considered and on which it will have held hearings to obtain the views of the public, especially interested and affected persons in the Lower Cape Cod area.

Subsection (b) also requires the Secretary of the Interior to give wide notification, in addition to publication in the Federal Register, of his establishment of the Park to all persons directly interested and affected; by registered mail to the Governor of Massachusetts and the boards of selectmen of each of the towns on the Lower Cape; by publication in newspapers circulating in such towns so that all citizens may have ready notice; and by recording at the Barnstable County Registry of Deeds in order that all persons concerned with the title to property in the Park area may have convenient notice.

This section of the bill together with sections 5 and 6 may be considered as the heart of the bill for purposes of preservation of the way of life of the Lower Cape Cod as well as the geographic area to be included in the Park. Their provisions represent an unprecedented innovation in national park legislation to accommodate the special circumstances of Lower Cape Cod. They are designed to assure that this area will be preserved for the purposes set forth in the preamble of the bill in such a way as adequately to safeguard the private and municipal interests in the area. These or provisions of similar effect are deemed by the authors of this bill to be essential to any legislation for the establishment of Cape Cod National Seashore Park.

The combined effect of sections 4, 5, and 6 may be summarized as follows:

All homeowners within the Park area are assured as a minimum the right to continue to use and occupy their homes for 25 years or for their lifetimes, whichever they choose.

If a town adopts zoning applicable to all of the property in such town which is included in the Park and such zoning meets standards defined by the Secretary of the Interior consistent with the bill, all homeowners in such town whose property is in the Park are assured the right to continue to own and occupy their homes without interruption or interference so long as the zoning is kept in force.

Provision is made for setting aside in each of the Lower Cape towns, an amount of acreage equal to as much as 10 percent of the total area of privately owned property in that town which is in the Park, for new homebuilding development, on condition that such acreage is subjected to acceptable zoning and that such development would not hurt the Park.

In order to explain how the foregoing effects are achieved it is necessary first to say a few words about the power of eminent domain or condemnation. As a matter of general law this power, like the taxing power and the police power, is not given by any constitutional provision but is inherent in the Government as an incident of sovereignty, being necessary for the preservation of governmental effectiveness. There is a constitutional requirement that the Government shall pay just compensation to the owner of property which is taken by condemnation; this is merely a limitation on the exercise of the preexisting power to condemn to which all property is subject. Whenever lands are needed for a public purpose, such as the establishment of Cape Cod National Seashore Park, Congress may authorize that they be acquired by condemnation from any State or any political subdivision thereof and from private landowners. (Subsection 2(a) of this bill bars condemnation of public property by requiring concurrence of any public owner in acquisitions of public property.)

Congress, by the act of August 1, 1888, conferred general authority on any officer of the Federal Government authorized to acquire real estate for public uses to acquire it by condemnation. Therefore, any specific law authorizing the acquisition of lands by the Secretary of the Interior for the establishment of a national park need not contain power of condemnation for the Secretary already has this power under the act of August 1, 1888. It is clearly necessary that he should have this power, because the title to much property in the proposed Cape Cod National Seashore Park area is unknown so that there is no owner with whom to negotiate a purchase of the property. Also, in such unusual instance where it may not be possible for the Secretary to acquire some much-needed property by negotiation, he must be able to condemn the property so that he may carry out the duty given to him by Congress to establish the Park.

In practice, the Secretary of the Interior has rarely used the power of condemnation in acquiring property for park purposes. Rather, he had proceeded by negotiation and purchase. Nevertheless, so long as the power exists, it may reasonably be viewed as a potential instrument of interference with or interruption of the ownership or enjoyment of property to which it could be applied. Existing private homeowners in the area of the proposed Park and persons wishing to build homes feel a need to have some legally binding assurance that the power will not be exercised to disturb them in order truly to safeguard their way of life on Cape Cod within the Park. So the authors of this bill have provided several novel limitations of the Secretary's power of condemnation which are designed to give such assurance.

Subsection (a) gives the private owners of improved property the right as a condition of any acquisition by the Secretary to retain the right to use and occupy their property for noncommercial residential purposes for the remainder of their lives or for a term of up to 25 years, whichever they elect. If they retain use and occupancy for a fixed term of years they are further safeguarded the right to convey or lease their right of occupancy until it expires. This means that if someone wanted to sell or lease to some third party the right to occupy his house for all or part of the fixed period of years for which he retained the right of occupancy, he could do so. This would be only for noncommercial residential purposes; and as to all but not a part of his property. If such a right of occupancy were retained in property acquired for the Park, the price paid to the owners for the property would be decreased from its full fair market value by the value of the right of occupancy retained. The person occupying the property would continue to pay town real estate taxes thereon.

Subsection (b). Paragraph (1) provides that the Secretary's authority to acquire property by condemnation shall be suspended as to all improved property throughout the Park area for 1 year following the enactment of the bill. The purpose of this provision is to allow a reasonable time during which the towns may adopt zoning bylaws which meet the standards called for in section 6 of the bill. Thereafter, as will be explained in the discussion of paragraphs (2) and (3) below, the power of condemnation of improved property is suspended on condition that such zoning is in force. The term "improved property" is defined in subsection (d) (see explanation below) to mean a noncommercial dwelling.

Paragraph (2) provides that the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to acquire improved property within the Park by eminent domain will be suspended in a particular town so long as the town has in force a duly adopted, valid zoning bylaw approved by the Secretary in accordance with section 6, i.e., which prohibits commercial and industrial use of property, contains suitable acreage, frontage and setback restrictions and other provisions which may be desirable to preserve and develop the Park area and does not contain provisions which would be undesirable for this purpose. Some form of zoning must apply to all of the Park area located within the town but it need not be identical with respect to the entire area so long as it meets the minimum requirements of the bill and of the Secretary as to all or any part of the area. The town would be free, subject to meeting these minimum specifications, to adopt zoning of one character for one area of the Park and of a different character for another area of the Park.

Subsection (c) places restrictions on the Secretary's power of condemnation as applied to property used for commercial or industrial purposes. Broadly speaking, it will be contrary to the purposes of the Park for property within its boundaries to be used for commercial or industrial purposes. However, there are some such uses already in existence in this area. Furthermore, there may be a few limited such uses which will be permitted within the Park by the Secretary.

The existing uses cannot, of course, be outlawed by zoning adopted after the use began. In order to provide a means whereby owners of existing uses may be safeguarded from condemnation until they have had opportunity to apply to the Secretary for permission to continue them, this provision suspends the Secretary's condemnation authority during the pendency of the first application for permission made to the Secretary after the enactment of the bill and before the date of the establishment of the Park. Additionally, the provision suspends the power of eminent domain on property used for commercial or industrial purposes for all periods when such use is permitted by the Secretary. In this way the bill provides safeguards to the owners of property used for commercial or industrial purposes consistent with the best interests of the Park.

Subsection (d) contains a definition of what is meant by "improved property." The significance of this definition is to determine the property within the Park as to which an owner may retain a right of occupancy under subsection 4(a) and as to which the power of eminent domain is suspendable under subsection 4(b).

Improved property is defined as a private noncommercial dwelling, including the land on which it is situated, whose construction was begun before September 1, 1959, and any structures accessory thereto, together with such amount and locus of the adjoining property owned by the same owner as the dwelling, as the Secretary designates to be reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of such dwelling for noncommercial residential use and occupancy. (It is the intention of the bill that a private home which is rented from time to time, or for the summer seasons, but on a private, rather than a publicly commercial, basis, shall be considered as "improved property" as defined in this subsection.) In making this designation the Secretary is directed to take into account the manner of noncommercial residential use and occupancy in which the dwelling and such adjoining property has usually been enjoyed by its owner or occupant. In no case shall the amount of such adjoining property which the Secretary designates be less than 3 acres, or whatever lesser amount the owner may have. The Secretary may, however, as to any owner, exclude from his designation beach or waters and any land adjoining them vital for public access. This provides a flexible means for safeguarding from possible condemnation private homes together with areas of adjoining land large enough to provide continued satisfaction to homeowners while at the same time assuring reasonable access by Park users to areas of undeveloped land, including beach and waters, which are surplus to the reasonable private and personal needs of homeowners.

In this connection it is well to note also the provision of paragraph 9(b)(2) of the bill, which directs the Secretary wherever practical to "provide recreational and other facilities for the public in such places and manner as will not diminish for its owners or occupants the value or enjoyment of any improved property located within the Park."

Property on which construction of a dwelling was not begun before September 1, 1959, is not eligible for condemnation authority suspension except as provided in section 5. The reason for this is to assure that any future residential development which takes place in the Park area will be subject to the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of this bill.

SECTION 5

The authors of this bill believe that in addition to safeguarding the continued right of occupancy of existing residents in the Park area as provided in section 4, it is also desirable to provide a limited opportunity for additional noncommercial residential development to take place within the Park area so as to assure the financial stability of the Lower Cape.

Subsection (a) therefore would establish a Congressional policy that such additional development of land be permitted within the area of the Park provided that any particular such development would not hurt the Park, and provided that the land is made subject to acceptable zoning.

Subsection (b) directs the Secretary to designate in each of the Lower Cape towns, at its request, an amount of acreage of unimproved property for noncommercial residential development not to exceed 10 percent of the total amount of privately owned property within the Park in that town. The town's request must be voted by a lawful town meeting, ratified by the advisory commission established by section 10, and made to the Secretary within 5 years after the enactment of the bill. If the property requested for development by the town is covered by approved zoning, unless the Secretary feels the particular development area requested by the town would hurt the Park, he must designate the area and then his authority to condemn it is suspended so long as it continues under approved zoning.

The acreage which it would be possible to keep open for future development would be roughly as follows: Chatham, 60 acres; Eastham, 345 acres; Orleans, 100 acres; Truro, 710 acres; Wellfleet, 580 acres. Each of these figures represents 10 percent of the total privately owned property in the area of the town included in the Park.

It should be emphasized that these figures represent only the possible development within the Park under this bill. They give no picture of the additional development opportunity on land outside the Park boundaries.

It is the intention of this subsection that the particular areas in which further residential development will take place be determined on a cooperative basis by the Park Service, private citizens and town officials. The subsection is deliberately designed to provide the utmost flexibility as to the selection of areas for development. They may be areas now totally undeveloped or they may be gap fillers in areas now partially developed. The reason for the requirement that the areas for development be designated not later than 5 years after the establishment of the Park is to provide within a reasonably short time a stable basis and framework for long-range town planning in the light of the advent of the Park.

Section 5 is designed to recognize the possible needs of the Lower Cape towns for a limited additional amount of homebuilding within the Park area in order to assure these towns a steady base of tax revenue and their citizens a continued healthy level of economic activity. In view of this provision it is believed that any needed continued residential development on the Lower Cape is amply safeguarded. The sponsors are confident that the establishment of Cape Cod National Seashore Park under legislation such as this bill will preserve the Lower Cape in accordance with their purposes explained in the introduction.

As a final comment on section 5, it should be noted that the sponsors of the bill gave consideration to implementing its purpose by excluding various property from the area proposed for the Park in the National Park Service's report, as a way of assuring that such property would be available for development. Although this approach might have been simpler it was rejected for the reason that the sponsors believe that the determination as to what particular areas are most suitable for additional development, consistent with the welfare of the Park, is one which should be made so far as possible by citizens of the six towns and their elected officials working with the officials of the Park Service. This seems to the sponsors a fairer procedure and one more likely to produce wise decisions for the Lower Cape communities without jeopardizing the Park than for the Congress to attempt such decisions, because of the inherently less concentrated, detailed and individualized consideration which its heavy schedule of work might permit.

SECTION 6

The Federal Government does not have authority directly to enact zoning laws applicable to private property in any of the States. If it had such authority the task of preserving an area such as Lower Cape Cod in such a way as to safeguard the interests of private landowners might be somewhat simplified, for Congress could simply enact a zoning law for the area. However, in the division of powers between the States and the Federal Government it is wisely left to States and municipalities to adopt zoning laws.

If the Federal Government acting on behalf of all the people of the United States is to establish a national seashore park in such a way as not to interfere with the continued ownership and enjoyment of their property by private landowners within the Park area, it is only reasonable that the communities involved adopt zoning laws which will assure that the property within the Park will be used in a manner consistent with the purposes of the Park.

For this reason section 6 requires the Secretary of the Interior to issue regulations as soon as possible after the enactment of the bill setting forth the standards which must be met by town zoning bylaws for purposes of suspending his power of eminent domain as provided in sections 4 and 5. Zoning bylaws which meet such standards must be approved by the Secretary.

In order to afford flexibility in the precise formulation of zoning bylaws and to avoid undue Congressional interference, even though indirectly achieved, in the detailed specification of the contents of such bylaws, the provisions of subsection (b) of section 6 are quite general in their terms.

The sponsors are confident that the officials of the Park Service working with the town officials and the Advisory Commission to be established under section 10 will arrive at sound zoning provisions.

Subsection (c) provides that no zoning bylaw shall be approved by the Secretary which contains any provision which he believes would interfere with the preservation and development of the Park area or fails to make provision for his receiving notice of any exception made to, variance granted under or amendment adopted to such a zoning bylaw.

Subsection (d) provides that if property has been zoned so as to suspend the Secretary's power of condemnation with respect to that property and subsequently the property is made the subject of an exception to or variance under the zoning bylaw with the result that it becomes exempt from the zoning standards called for in section 6, then in such case the Secretary may terminate the suspension of his condemnation power. Without this provision it would be possible through zoning variances to defeat the intended effects of sections 4, 5, and 6 of the bill.

SECTION 7

Section 7 provides that the Secretary shall furnish any interested person who requests it, a certificate suitable for recording at the Barnstable County Registry of Deeds indicating that the power of eminent domain has been suspended with respect to any particular property. The purpose of this provision is to afford any individual citizen a ready means for determining this fact. This provision should serve to facilitate real estate transactions involving property located within the Park area.

SECTION 8

Subsection (a) provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall make payments in lieu of taxes on account of privately owned real estate acquired for the Park. In the year of acquisition the amount of taxes assessed on a given piece of property would be apportioned between the private owner and the Federal Government in accordance with the proportions of the year during which they respectively owned the property. In the 2 subsequent years the Federal Government would pay the full amount of the tax as assessed in the year in which it acquired the property.

It should be noted that such payments in lieu of taxes will be made to a town only if the town has been authorized under the laws of Massachusetts to assess taxes upon real estate to the person who is in possession thereof and to assess taxes upon any present interest in real estate to the owner of such interest. The reason for this condition is to assure that before the Federal Government makes payment in lieu of taxes on account of property which it acquires within the Park the towns will also collect taxes from all private occupants of land within the Park. If property is acquired for the Park subject to a right of occupancy, a town would not be able to tax such property unless it had authority from the Massachusetts tax commisisoner permitting the taxation of the occupant.

Under Massachusetts law taxes on real estate are required to be assessed to the person who is the owner on January 1. But the tax commissioner may in writing authorize the assessment of taxes upon real estate "to the person who is in possession thereof on January 1." He may also in writing authorize the assessment of taxes "upon any present interest in real estate to the owner of such interest on January 1 and taxes on such interest may thereupon be assessed to such person." (G.L., C. 59, sec. 11) Massachusetts law specifically exempts property owned by the United States from taxation by towns. (G.L., C. 59, sec. 5.)

Subsection (b) is designed to make clear that payments in lieu of taxes shall be made only on account of property as to which the full title was in the first instance acquired by the Federal Government. In other words, if property is acquired for the Park under terms such that the private owner retains some right or interest therein, thereby not interrupting his payment of real estate taxes on account of such property, no payments in lieu of taxes would be made by the Federal Government.

Subsection (c) provides for the Secretary of the Interior to determine each year as soon as possible after real estate taxes have been assessed the amount of payments in lieu of taxes due to each of the towns and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such amounts to the towns.

Subsection (d) provides that the foregoing arrangement for payments in lieu of taxes shall not apply to property acquired after December 31 of the 25th year following the enactment of the bill.

The purpose of section 5 is to provide a cushion for each of the towns in the Lower Cape area against any dip in tax revenues resulting from acquisition of private property for the Park.

The sponsors believe that the following factors will tend to increase net tax revenue of the towns:

1. The safeguard to continued occupancy of private residential property within the Park assured by section 4 of the bill.

2. The safeguard to continued residential development within the Park assured by section 5.

3. The steady increase in value of all taxable Lower Cape property which can be expected to accelerate when a seashore park is established.

4. The gradual reduction of some municipal services such as road and beach maintenance, police and fire protection, which will be assumed in part by the Park Service within the Park area.

In view of these factors there will probably be no, or at most very small, real need for payments in lieu of taxes to stabilize town revenues. It is the view of the sponsors that the only condition which might upset this forecast is if very substantial amounts of property from which the towns are now receiving tax revenues were to be acquired within a short span of time. It is as a hedge against this contingency that provision for payments in lieu of taxes has been included in the bill. Past experience in the establishment of national park and national seashore areas all indicates that property acquisition is a gradual process whose impact from the standpoint of reducing tax revenues is not sharp or sudden. In view of the much greater complexities in property acquisition which will be entailed in the Cape Cod National Seashore Park, partly because of the nature of the property involved (much of it improved, and much of it uncertain as to title), partly because of the provisions of the bill designed to safeguard private and municipal interests, it is only reasonable to expect that the revenue-reducing impact of this Park will be even less significant than has been the case with previous parks.

SECTION 9

Subsection (a) of section 9 is designed to set forth in general terms the manner in which Cape Cod National Seashore Park shall be administered for the benefit of the American public. It contemplates administration in a manner with which the public has become increasingly familiar by reason of experience with previously established national park and seashore areas. It contemplates the preservation of old and historic buildings and sites.

Subsection (b) recognizes the unique opportunities afforded for multiple use of a national area on the Lower Cape. These have been fully described in the report of the National Park Service and so no effort is made to describe them herein. Paragraph

(2) of subsection (b) is designed to assure that the development of the Park for its varied purposes will be managed in such a way as not to diminish the value or enjoyment of any residential property in the Park for its owners and occupants.

Subsection (c) provides that any land and waters within the Park boundaries which are now or hereafter in a migratory bird refuge will continue as a refuge but may be administered for recreational uses which do not interfere with the purposes of the refuge. This provision is designed principally to accommodate the inclusion of Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge within the boundaries of the Park. It assures that the refuge purposes of the area will not be submerged by recreational activities and it also makes clear that the Secretary may enlarge the present Refuge by adding other land acquired for the Park.

A few matters of special significance and interest to residents of Cape Cod and New England provided by subsection (d) deserve mention:

1. Fishing, including shellfishing which is to be regulated as is now the case by the towns, would be specifically authorized within the Park.

2. Waterfowling would be permitted consistent with existing Federal and Massachusetts law.

3. Upland game and deer hunting could also be permitted consistent with Massachusetts law.

Final authority in determining the nature and extent of hunting and fishing, other than shellfishing, will rest with the Secretary. However, it is the expectation of the sponsors that under subsection (d) the Secretary will cooperate with appropriate State and town officials to work out provision for such hunting and fishing as may be permitted, consistent with the best principles of wildlife management and conservation and with the management of the Park for other purposes of conservation and recreation.

SECTION 10

Section 10 establishes a Cape Cod National Seashore Park Advisory Commission composed of a representative from each of the six Lower Cape towns, two representatives of Massachusetts, and one of the Secretary of the Interior. The purpose of this Commission is to serve in various matters relating to the administration and development of the Park by the Federal Government as a liaison between the Federal Government on the one hand and the State and local governments on the other. The sponsors have not attempted to specify in rigid detail the exact methods to be followed by the Commission in playing its important role, feeling confident that this should properly be left to the wisdom and good judgment of the persons who will serve on the Commission and the responsible officials of the Interior Department whose joint task and opportunity it will be soundly to develop and administer the Park. For example, the sponsors assume that no major decisions would be made relative to the Park by the Park Service without consulting with the Advisory Commission; that no member of the Advisory Commission would participate in decisions or advice of the Commission affecting a matter in which he had any personal interest; that no member of the Commission would adopt a strictly parochial attitude on behalf of the governmental unit which he represented.

This bill will only be enacted and the Park successfully established and administered if such principles are inherent in the behavior of all public officials having responsibility or concern for the Park. Such principles cannot be infused into official behavior by legislation and in the judgment of the sponsors it would be a mistake to try to do so.

Subsection (a) provides the authority necessary as a precondition to the appropriation by the Congress of funds necessary to carry out the provisions of the bill once enacted. It contains a limitation of $15 million on the amount which may be appropriated over a period of years for purposes of acquiring property in the Park.

Subsection (b) provides that any revenues which are received as a result of disposal by the Secretary of the buildings or structures in accordance with subsection 2(f) shall be segregated in the Treasury and available to the Secretary for expenditure in acquiring property in the Park. Such revenues really represent a return of part of previous costs of acquisition and should therefore be kept available for the purpose of making additional acquisitions of property for the Park.

SECTION 12

Section 12 is a separability clause designed to assure that if the bill should be held invalid in some particular application or provision, the rest of the bill and its application in other situations would not thereby be affected.

CAPE COD NATIONAL SEASHORE—A PROPOSAL BY U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

CAPE COD: A VANISHING SCENE

Memorandum

JANUARY 28, 1959.

To: Director, National Park Service.
From: Secretary of the Interior.
Subject: Report on Cape Cod National Seashore proposal.

The draft of the report on the Cape Cod National Seashore proposal has just been received by this office and is being reviewed.

In view of the numerous inquiries about copies of the report, please proceed as rapidly as possible with its publication, using the donated, non-Government funds available for that purpose.

The report may be released upon request, for information purposes, if a copy of this memorandum is included in the bound report to show that the report is still under consideration by the Department of Interior, and that its publication at this time should not be construed either as approval or disapproval by the Department of its recommendations.

FRED A. SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior.

A great peninsula, shaped like a bold bent arm, thrusts some 70 miles into the Atlantic Ocean from the Massachusetts mainland. This is Cape Cod, landmark and haven for mariners who sought a new world or wrested their living from a perilous sea. Here vacationists now seek refreshment along sweeping shores and quiet coves.

Heaped up by glaciers long ago; then molded by winds and waves and currents, Cape Cod has been endowed with plant and animal life in rich variety. Now it is a scene of everchanging charm, beautiful to behold, fascinating to study. Surf pounds the eastern headland. Calmer waters of Cape Cod Bay and Nantucket Sound wash the cape's northern and southern shores. Between, the winds brush heath and marsh and woodland, ruffling ponds the glaciers left behind.

On the ocean side of the cape's forearm lies Great Beach, a magnificent ocean shore. For three centuries, this extraordinary shoreline was spared the great industrial buildup of our eastern coast. Before the automobile age, Cape Cod was "off the beaten path." The modern highway has changed that. Now it is within a day's travel of nearly one-third of our Nation's population—less than 300 highway miles from all six New England capitals and New York City; an hour and a half by air from Washington, D.C. And as transportation improvements continue to cut time and distance, the cape is ever closer to all America.

The inexorable march of progress brings many and varied benefits for which we can be deeply thankful. But inevitably the march imperils other values, old and often deeply loved. This surging tide of modern progress has rolled over vast areas of our pristine coastal country, wiping out, one after another, the natural open spaces long cherished as an American birthright. Houses, businesses, resorts of all kinds continue ever more rapidly to disrupt and destroy the very beauties we seek most to enjoy.

This is happening to Cape Cod. Even now the still-unspoiled Great Beach is vanishing under buildings. It is time to set aside, preserve, and protect the last of the old cape so that the inspiration of its surpassing beauty can be kept intact and handed down to future generations of Americans.

Until now, that beauty has been protected by the good taste and care of individuals, the towns, and the Commonwealth. Their efforts, however, may soon be engulfed by the wave of development that threatens. National protection will be needed to achieve the conservation ideals of the people who love Cape Cod.

TO SAVE IT—A NATIONAL SEASHORE

To save this irreplaceable treasure for the future, therefore, a Cape Cod National Seashore comprising Great Beach and related areas is proposed.

Great Beach is unquestionably of national seashore caliber. This became evident during a 1954–55 survey of park and recreation possibilities along the Atlantic and gulf coastlines. The survey, conducted by the National Park Service with donated funds, found Great Beach to be among the finest seashores on our entire Atlantic coast. More detailed studies then were made to determine the full potential and possible boundaries for an area dedicated to public purposes.

The beach itself was the most obvious feature of national seashore quality. But the studies made clear that Cape Cod's charm is not confined to the shore alone. Heath, marsh, forest land, and lake, each with its community of plant and animal life, also are basic elements of the cape's distinctive character. They form a unity, one near and palpable memory of glacial times, for continental ice has shaped them all. Examples of each must be included in the proposed national seashore if it is to preserve intact this whole complex of natural features, essentially unaffected by surrounding land uses.

The proposal, therefore, is a national seashore of about 30,000 acres. It is a ribbon-like territory, extending some 40 miles along the outer coast from Provincetown to the tip of Nauset Beach and nearby Morris Island and Harding Beach in Chatham. The bulk of the area lies east of U.S. Highway 6, and its average width approximates 1 mile. The area reaches a maximum width of 4 miles in the central section, where it extends across the highway to include a highly significant cross section of the outer cape and a portion of the Cape Cod Bay shore.

The finest of the cape's natural attractions are represented in this proposed national seashore. The suggested boundaries would guard the setting against future intrusions, and have been drawn to exclude villages and commercial areas.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF A CAPE COD NATIONAL SEASHORE

National significance—scenic, scientific, or historic stature so great, so precious as to make its preservation the concern of all Americans—this is the criterion for areas to be included within the national park system. Cape Cod meets this criterion eminently with a range of qualities stimulating to people in all walks of life. Attesting the magnetic appeal of the cape are the many artists and photographers who have long appreciated its esthetic values. Writers as well find inspiration in the scene and in the colorful history of the region. Scholars and nature lovers alike take keen interest here in a wealth of plants, birds, and animals; in the life of the sea, and in the record of a glacial past.

On Cape Cod one process—glaciation—shaped many landscapes. Different plant communities then spread across them, adding variety to variety. The proposed national seashore area is relatively small, but because of these extraordinary geological and biological factors, its scenery is unusually interesting.

These factors, of course, make the proposed national seashore a valuable field for scientific study. Nowhere on this continent is the story of glacial deposition, combined with the violent action of the sea upon a land mass, so vividly illustrated as on Cape Cod. Here the results of these forces are manifest, not on far mountains but in the very sands and gravels under foot.

Nowhere in this North Atlantic region does so impressive an unbroken ocean beach border such a scenic and interesting hinterland. The cape's mild maritime climate not only is favorable for recreation but also maintains on the peninsula many types of vegetation. Still persisting are northern plants and trees that flourished on the cape immediately following the retreat of the glacial ice. A warm era a thousand years ago brought southern species that yet linger here.

To the haven of Cape Cod come multitudes of birds, winging the Atlantic flyway to nest or sojourn here. The sea and the tidal marshes hold myriad lives. The tiny creatures of the beach withstand an ocean's battering, and beneath the deep water the schools of fish move in ways no man has fully fathomed.

Historically significant, Cape Cod was the Pilgrims' first landfall in the New World, and in later years harbored many of New England's famed fishing and whaling fleets. Courage sailed those fleets; faith awaited their return. The men and women Cape Cod reared have bequeathed to America a proud, intrepid heritage.

Representing the best of Cape Cod's natural features, the proposed national seashore holds many and varied recreation opportunities. Swimming in the surf; hiking the dunes, beaches, and forests are pleasures that can be widely enjoyed. Opportunities are also excellent for camping, boating, and bicycling, as well as for photography, sketching, bird study, and nature research of many kinds. Cape Cod is among the 10 most famous salt water fishing areas of the United States.

These healthful activities, which bring us close to earth and sea, help in turn to make us realize Cape Cod's truly great significance. Through these types of recreation we can better see the subtle splendors of the cape, feel the pulse of nature, and remember a stalwart history. Thus do we gain inspiration from the scene.

We must cherish and protect that scene, however, or our eagerness for recreation will abuse it. In administering areas within the national park system, it is the duty of the National Park Service under law to "conserve the scenery and the natural and historic objects and the wildlife therein and to provide for the enjoyment of the same in such manner and by such means as will leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations."

Here is an area where, under such a policy, a part of Cape Cod's outstanding recreation values may be conserved for public benefit and use, without harm to the features on which that recreation depends.

CHANGING LANDSCAPES—CHANGING MOODS

Cape Cod's "mightie headland" facing the Atlantic has been the subject of comment since mariners first charted it. Thoreau named it Great Beach. "A man may stand there," he wrote, "and put all America behind him." This outer beach extends from Race Point on the tip of the cape to the southern end of Nauset Beach in Chatham, a distance of about 40 miles. It is broken only once, at Nauset Harbor Inlet.

The mood of the outer beach changes with time, tide, seasons, and weather, creating unlimited visual impressions. Fifteen miles of the central section are characterized by the bank of original glacial deposits, varying in height from 50 to 175 feet and sliced by the elements into clean-sloping cliffs. Ocean panoramas from these heights are among the finest in America. Below, the cliffs wall in a solitude of beach and surf.

At Provincetown and Truro there are eight square miles of some of the most spectacular dunes along the Atlantic seaboard. Unlike the cliffs, they have been built up since glacial times with material eroded from the outer banks. Here the scenes are as shifting as the tides and sands. The dunes move to engulf the forest as tiny plant roots grip them in an endless struggle for survival.

Below the headlands near Nauset Light a spit extends the beach southward for 15 miles, barring the surf from the waters of Pleasant Bay. Although the spit averages less than a quarter of a mile in width, this postglacial deposit provides, in its central section, the broadest beach along the entire outer arm of the cape. Low dunes lie behind the beach, and behind the dunes are picturesque marshes rich in bird and marine life.

A different, a more placid mood pervades that section of the proposed national seashore that borders Cape Cod Bay. Along a representative 6½ miles of beach north of Jeremy Point, the sea is gentle and the strand is wide. The 500 acres of Jeremy Point, Great Beach Hill, and Great Island, linked to the cape only by a strip of sand, seem isolated and remote. Yet they offer views of traditional Cape Cod life and activity. From here one can watch clam diggers probing the beaches, and can see the far steeples of Provincetown, the sails that fleck the cove, the fishing boats riding in Wellfleet Harbor.

Up from the northern half of the bayside beach roll extensive heathlands reminiscent of old England's countryside. Maples and tupelos mark the course of the Herring River, haunt of mink and muskrat. Wild geese and ducks feed in the marshes of Duck Harbor and Bound Brook. Eastward, heath and marsh give way to forests of pitch pine and mixed hardwoods extending to the salt spray of the Atlantic.

These woodlands hold another Cape Cod world, so near the crashing surf yet secret from it and serene. Fresh-water ponds lap softly here, spangled with water lilies and edged with rushes, pickerel weed, and water lobelia. Inkberry and sweet pepper bushes crowd banks which once surrounded buried icebergs, for these ponds now fill glacial "kettleholes" left by the melted ice. There are 20 named ponds in the area, ranging in size to 109 acres and with characteristics differing with drainage and exposure to wind. North of the ponds, amid the cape's most rugged countryside, the headwaters of the Pamet and Little Pamet Rivers flow through valleys, once cut by glacial torrents.

Off the elbow of Cape Cod lies Monomoy Island, a 10-mile length of barrier beach where only shrubs and grasses have withstood the sea's salt lash. Monomoy is a National Wildlife Refuge administered by the U.S. Department of the Interior, and provides nesting, feeding, and resting grounds for more than 300 species of birds. Morris Island and Harding Beach, two important natural areas closely associated with Monomoy Island, are highly desirable as part of the proposed national seashore. Excellent forest cover, animal life, a rare coast white cedar bog, and an interesting geologic history add to the attraction of Morris Island. Harding Beach is the only beach on the south shore of the cape in the suggested seashore area.

LOOKING BACK: A LANDMARK OF HISTORY

Indians were living on Cape Cod well before the Christian era. Sites excavated by archeologists disclose a continuous Indian occupation down to historic times.

The Vikings may have been the first white men to see Cape Cod. Indeed, the "Wonder Strands" they afterwards described may well have been Great Beach.

Unnamed fishermen followed the Vikings, and their unrecorded tales probably helped to turn explorers west rather than east during the 15th and 16th centuries. John Cabot was perhaps the first explorer to round the cape. Then came Verrazano; Bartholomew Gosnold, who gave the cape its name; Champlain, pioneer geographer of the region; and Capt. John Smith, who drew the first accurate map of it. Cape Cod was inevitably a landmark in the age of exploration.

Landmark became landing place when the Pilgrims arrived in Provincetown Harbor in November 1620. These New England founders lingered a few weeks at the cape while making their first tentative contacts with a strange new world. From here they sailed to find the harbor—Plymouth—that became their home. Permanent settlement of Cape Cod did not come until 1637.

Seafaring conditioned the cape's development in the years following, when every little harbor and estuary had its fishing fleet. The cape's drift whaling and shore whaling of the 17th century began the great American whaling saga that was to reach its climax in the mid-19th century. Provincetown, a leading fishing center after the Revolutionary War, remained also a whaling port of consequence even when Nantucket and New Bedford later dominated that famous industry. Sharing Provincetown's prosperity were Truro, Chatham, and Wellfleet. In 1851, Wellfleet stood second only to Gloucester in fishing, and from 1830 to 1870 it was the oyster capital of New England.

Cape Cod's fishing prosperity built an important salt industry, with its salt works, fish drying racks, and picturesque windmills. Lighthouses, the earliest built in 1797, meanwhile stood witness to the hazard of a coast that perhaps has equal claim with Hatteras to be called Graveyard of the Atlantic.

Salvage from British warships wrecked off Great Beach during the Revolutionary War helped Cape Codders to weather a British blockade. Although only Falmouth on the lower cape was raided, an enemy squadron occupied Provincetown Harbor, and the entire peninsula lived under the threat of naval attack. Cape whalingmen, their normal activities disrupted, because privateersmen, sailing in whatever home ships could be freed or manning the privateers of other ports.

In modern times, World Wars I and II brought stern reminders of this earlier enemy activity. On the beach at East Orleans fell the only hostile shots, reportedly, to land on American soil in World War I—fired by a German U-boat. Residents today remember survivors of torpedoed American transports in World War II being brought ashore at Provincetown.

LOOKING AHEAD: A LEGACY PRESERVED

Recreation has long been the most productive use of the lands still suitable for the proposed Cape Cod National Seashore. Low fertility makes them unsuitable for agriculture, and transportation distances, lack of raw material, and possible depletion of fresh water under extensive use greatly limit their industrial potential. The economic history of the cape reflects a continuous change from the original broad economic base of fishing and agriculture to specialization in recreation services. Without immediate preservation of the cape's natural features, however, there is great danger that the recreational qualities which have drawn increasing numbers to the cape each year will soon be lost for all time, consumed by commercialization and real-estate subdivisions.

In order not to damage the values which the national seashore would preserve, any facilities needed in it would be held to the minimum consistent with public safety, comfort, and enjoyment. No major commercial enterprises within the boundaries are necessary or contemplated. Private enterprise in the adjoining communities would therefore be relied upon to supply meals, lodging, wares, and visitor services. Many such businesses already exist, and it is anticipated that they can be expanded as demand increases.

Development in the seashore would consist primarily of centers where visitors could learn about the area; ranger stations; camping, picnicking, and swimming places with adjacent parking; wayside exhibits, and a system of trails. Roads would be of a type that would permit safe, leisurely enjoyment of the scenery, and portions of the area would be left roadless to preserve their characteristic charm of remoteness.

In planning essential facilities, extreme care would, of course, be taken to insure that they not obtrude upon natural and historic features. Structures within the boundaries of the seashore would be designed to blend harmoniously with the natural scene and with the traditional Cape Cod architecture.

The primary purpose of the proposed Cape Cod National Seashore is to preserve henceforth for public enjoyment the scenic, scientific, and historic features that exist here. To the people of Cape Cod, whose livelihood depends upon an economy springing from the cape's natural recreation resources, this means insurance for the future. And, to the people of the Nation, this means that a source of quiet peace and inspiration, fast disappearing elsewhere, will always be available here, becoming more meaningful to each succeeding generation.

MONOMOY NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge is located on the "elbow" of Cape Cod, within the bounds of Chatham Township, Barnstable County, Mass. Geographically, the refuge is approximately 100 miles southeast of Boston, 260 miles east of Albany, N.Y., and 285 miles northeast of New York City. Inasmuch as the refuge area is an offshore island, access must be by short boat trip from Chatham, Mass. Accommodations and boat liveries are available locally. The town of Chatham can be reached by highway, air, rail, and bus. A refuge office is maintained at 453 Main Street, Chatham, Mass., telephone Chatham 526.

Monomoy Island serves as a very important link in the chain of migratory waterfowl refuges along the Atlantic flyway, which extends from Canada to Florida and the gulf. The island was formed by nature into a coastal barrier beach, ranging in width from one-quarter to 1½ miles, and stretching approximately 10 miles south from the mainland. The refuge area is bounded on the west by Nantucket Sound and on the east by the Atlantic Ocean. The entire island, comprising nearly 3,500 acres, consists of sand dunes, salt and fresh marshes, freshwater ponds, potholes, and coastal thickets. The major portion of Monomoy refuge is covered by sand dunes, low sweeping salt-marsh grass meadows and fresh-water marsh areas. At the head of the island is a section, known locally as Morris Island, which is densely wooded and thicketed by scrubby pines and underbrush.

Purpose: The refuge provides nesting, feeding, and resting grounds for waterfowl, shorebirds, land, and oceanic birds, comprising a known 309 species as indicated by refugee and ornithological observers. Although the area is managed mainly for waterfowl, particularly the black duck and Canada goose, many other species utilize the refuge and adjacent waters throughout the year. Monomoy's waterfowl and other birds converge upon the island from points throughout northeastern North America, particularly from Canada. During the height of the fall migration and subsequent wintering season, approximately a million eiders and scoters may use waters and shoal areas surrounding Monomoy.

History: The island which became the Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge in 1944 is a coastal barrier beach, cut away from Cape Cod and extending south from it. The cape itself is a moraine—a ridge of earth and stones collected by a glacier and deposited when warm winds and weather caused a sort of glacial fallout. The icefields had lifted and literally transplanted large accumulations of earth and rock, scraped and dragged along by the enormous weight of the moving ice mass. The coastal barrier beaches were then formed by tides, currents, and winds acting upon the moraine and the waters around them. Recently, this barrier strip was subjected to severe storms and high tides resulting in the breaching of the island at several places.

Refuge management: The management of this refuge is directed primarily toward the development, rehabilitation, and improvement of habitat for waterfowl. The location of Monomoy refuge in the direct course of the Atlantic flyway is of special importance. Rehabilitation of marsh areas, planting of wildlife food crops, development of nesting and resting areas, control of undesirable vegetation, development and maintenance of ponds and potholes, and protection during vulnerable periods have combined to result in increased usage of the refuge during annual migrations and concentrations.

Other protective management includes predator control, fur management, and sand dune erosion control, plus the building and planting of dikes and roadways as a part of shoreline improvement, to reduce destruction of erosive tides and winds. Tide control gates have been installed to conserve precipitation and to control fresh water levels. The development of numerous potholes and small ponds has been accomplished, providing additional feeding and resting areas. Black ducks, blue-wing teal, and red-breasted mergansers breed here each year. Monomoy Refuge is the southernmost point in North America where nesting of the red-breasted merganser occurs.

Natural food of the refuge are supplemented by planting of millet, smartweed, and rye on suitable areas adjacent to ponds, potholes, and marshes for greatest utilization. Census taking and seasonal usage analyses are standard refuge practices.

Wildlife: The island in its natural setting has long been renowned as a shorebird area. Many species may be seen in breeding or spring plumage during the spring migration which reaches its peak in May. During the fall migration, beginning in July, these species may be seen in their fall or winter plumage accompanied by immature birds.

The island with its varied habitat plays host to many species of land birds as well. Its unique coastal position provides a haven for migrant land birds forced to shore areas by strong westerly winds. Birdwalks are encouraged and have become increasingly popular among a large number of visitors. A bird list is available upon application to the refuge manager.

Mammals on the refuge include the white-tailed deer, fox, and occasionally muskrat, otter, and mink.

Recreation: Varied forms of recreation are available to the public on the refuge. They include fishing, camping, hiking, shell collecting, picnicking, and photography. Shellfishing is prohibited, except to people licensed by the town of Chatham.

Cape Cod and its surrounding waters offer one of America's most excellent fishing areas. Among the fish to be caught off Monomoy Island are striped bass, found from May through October; bluefish, caught from August through September; flounder and fluke, with seasons running from June through September; cod, year round; and haddock, caught from May through November. Numerous boat liveries in and around Chatham serve refuge visitors.

Hiking and picnicking are permitted as long as local, State, and Federal ordinances are strictly observed. These are largely concerned with public and private safety and fire prevention. Camping, picnicking, and fire building are restricted to the beach areas. There is no developed picnic area.

Photography is particularly encouraged, as the island offers a variety of landscapes, seascapes, and wildlife—all admirable subject matter for the photographer.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, my colleague and I hope this bill will be given thoughtful consideration this autumn, with the possibility of hearings being held on Cape Cod, and that in January there will be hearings on it for the purpose of receiving any suggested amendments to the bill. This is a draft we have prepared carefully, and which we believe is a sound basis for legislative consideration of the proposal which has been made by the National Park Service.

I thank my colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts, for yielding to me.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 51)

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield with that understanding.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I remarked yesterday, no one is fully satisfied with the product of compromise, for in the nature of the process each one gives away something of one's position. This bill is a compromise. I must frankly state that it goes a good deal further in some areas than I think is either desirable or necessary—this is especially true in the Taft-Hartley amendments. On the other hand, the House bill contained some serious weaknesses in the antiracketeering parts of the bill, all of which we were not able to shore up. I regret that it was not possible to close these loopholes.

The point is, nevertheless, that we have before us in this conference report what I believe to be the only bill that it is possible to obtain under all of the circumstances. As it came from the House with the Griffin-Landrum amendment, the bill, in my opinion, should not have commanded the support of a majority of the Senate. It contained serious flaws and in the form in which it passed by the other body, unnecessarily restricted normal, legitimate trade union activity.

The Senate conferees had several serious problems with the first six titles of the House bill—but these titles with certain exceptions followed very closely the substance of S. 1555 as it passed the Senate.

The Taft-Hartley amendments in the Griffin-Landrum substitute, however, went far beyond the provisions of the Senate-passed bill.

However, in the 12 days during which the conference met the majority of the Senate conferees secured important changes in the restrictive provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill, thereby protecting traditional and essential rights of workingmen seeking to improve conditions of employment. It is important that the Senate should note these changes:

First. No man's land: The Senate conferees insisted upon an amendment which prevents the NLRB from declining to exercise its existing jurisdiction and thereby depriving both employers and employees of the protection of the National Labor Relations Act. The Landrum-Griffin bill would have allowed the Board to surrender unlimited jurisdiction to the States, 35 of which provide no protection to the rights to organize and bargain collectively. The conference report prevents further cession. The current standards of the NLRB assure the widest effective exercise of Federal jurisdiction in the history of the National Labor Relations Act.

Second. Organizational picketing: The House bill would have forbidden virtually all organizational picketing, even though the pickets did not stop truck deliveries or exercise other economic coercion. The amendments adopted in the conference secure the right to engage in all forms of organizational picketing up to the time of an election in which the employees can freely express their desires with respect to the choice of a bargaining representative. When the picketing results in economic pressure through the refusal of other employees to cross the picket line, the bill would require a prompt election. Purely informational picketing cannot be curtailed under the conference report, although even this privilege would have been denied by the Landrum-Griffin measure.

Third. Secondary boycotts: The chief effect of the conference agreement, therefore, will be to plug loopholes in the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. There has never been any dispute about the desirability of plugging these artificial loopholes. The secondary boycott provisions of the House bill would have curtailed legitimate union activities. Accordingly, the Senate conferees insisted that the report secure the following rights:

(a) The right to engage in primary strikes and primary picketing even though the employees of other employers refused to cross the picket line.

The fact of the matter is that there is some question under the Landrum-Griffin bill whether employees of another employer could have properly refused to cross a picket line in a primary strike. That has been clarified in the conference report.

(b) The right of employees to refuse to work on goods farmed out from an establishment in which the employees are on strike.

The language in the Landrum-Griffin bill, dealing with how far the employees can go in following struck work was far more restrictive than the present law, and the conference report provision takes us back to present law, which is far more satisfactory.

(c) The right to appeal to consumers by methods other than picketing asking them to refrain from buying goods made by nonunion labor and to refrain from trading with a retailer who sells such goods.

Under the Landrum-Griffin bill it would have been impossible for a union to inform the customers of a secondary employer that that employer or store was selling goods which were made under racket conditions or sweatshop conditions, or in a plant where an economic strike was in progress. We were not able to persuade the House conferees to permit picketing in front of that secondary shop, but we were able to persuade them to agree that the union shall be free to conduct informational activity short of picketing. In other words, the union can hand out handbills at the shop, can place advertisements in newspapers, can make announcements over the radio, and can carry on all publicity short of having ambulatory picketing in front of a secondary site.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have been asked by people who are vitally concerned whether there is anything in the conference report which would limit or prohibit the buy-America campaigns which are being carried on by certain unions and business groups, and even by some governmental bodies. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the conference committee whether the report was intended to have this effect. It is certainly my own conviction that no such effect was intended, either by the Senate or by the conferees.

Mr. KENNEDY. I know that a good deal of effort has been made by some groups of workers, such as those who work on hats, to make sure that their working standards are protected. The answer to the Senator's question is no, it was not intended that the conference report have such an effect. I am glad that we have had the opportunity to establish legislative history in this matter.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

(d) The right of labor unions representing employees in the apparel and clothing industry to refuse to work for a jobber or contractor who subcontracts parts of the process of production to nonunion subcontractors. This guarantee, the writing of which into statutory legislation was opposed by the House conferees for 2 weeks, is absolutely essential to the stability of these industries. The bill makes special mention of the industry because it has peculiar problems.

Fourth. Hot cargo: The Landrum-Griffin bill extended the "hot cargo" provisions of the Senate bill, which we applied only to Teamsters, to all agreements between an employer and a labor union by which the employer agrees not to do business with another concern. The Senate insisted upon a qualification for the clothing and apparel industries and for agreements relating to work to be done at the site of a construction project. Both changes were necessary to avoid serious damage to the pattern of collective bargaining in these industries.

Fifth. Economic strikers: The conferees adopted the substance of the provisions of the Senate bill reversing the Taft-Hartley rule that economic strikers who have been replaced should not vote in an NLRB election. This is a highly important change, for the Taft-Hartley prohibition had, in the words of the President of the United States, opened the door to union-busting practices.

The House bill contained a provision on this, but it provided that economic strikers would not have the right to vote if the issue of recognition had been raised before the strike began. It would be extremely difficult for the employer to raise the issue of recognition in almost any economic strike, and in those conditions economic strikers would have been denied the right to vote. We guarantee them the right to vote for at least a year after the strike begins.

Sixth. Prehire agreements: The conference report incorporates the provisions of the Senate bill authorizing labor unions and contractors in the construction industry to negotiate prehire agreements. The Landrum-Griffin bill contains restrictive and unworkable provisions on this point.

Seventh. Employer reports: The conference provision adopts the substance of the Senate bill dealing with the reports to be filed by employers and labor relations consultants, the purpose of which is to disclose to the Government and public opinion any repetition of the unsavory practices brought to light by the McClellan committee. One of the important consequences of these reports will be the full disclosure of sums of money spent by employers to finance "front" organizations distributing propaganda designed to prevent further union organization.

The Landrum-Griffin bill contained a provision whereby if an employer gave $10,000 to a labor relations consultant and asked him to do what he could to see that a union was not organized in his plant, the labor relations consultant could then do anything he wanted with the money, however coercive or corrupt, without the employer's reporting the payment, provided only that the employer was not a party to the consultant's conduct. This was a hole a mile wide in the employer reporting section which was closed by the conference report.

Eighth. Membership lists: The House bill would have required a labor union to open its membership lists to any candidate in connection with an election of officers. Although this requirement might be fair in the case of bona fide candidates, it created grave dangers that stooges would obtain the membership lists for subversive organizations or commercial use. The Senate conferees added the safeguard of limiting the right to one inspection within 30 days prior to an election, without making copies of the list.

In addition to these major changes in the bill as it came from the House, there are a number of other provisions about which I believe the Senate should be fully informed. This is for the purpose of establishing some legislative history.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO SUE (SEC. 101(A)(4))

The protection of the right to sue provision originated in the Senate bill and was adopted verbatim in the Landrum-Griffin bill except that the first proviso limiting exhaustion of internal hearing procedures was changed from 6 months to 4 months. The basic intent and purpose of the provision was to insure the right of a union member to resort to the courts, administrative agencies, and legislatures without interference or frustration of that right by a labor organization. On the other hand, it was not, and is not, the purpose of the law to eliminate existing grievance procedures established by union constitutions for redress of alleged violation of their internal governing laws. Nor is it the intent or purpose of the provision to invalidate the considerable body of State and Federal court decisions of many years standing which require, or do not require, the exhaustion of internal remedies prior to court intervention depending upon the reasonableness of such requirements in terms of the facts and circumstances of a particular case. So long as the union member is not prevented by his union from resorting to the courts, the intent and purpose of the "right to sue" provision is fulfilled, and any requirements which the court may then impose in terms of pursuing reasonable remedies within the organization to redress violation of his union constitutional rights will not conflict with the statute. The doctrine of exhaustion of reasonable internal union remedies for violation of union laws is just as firmly established as the doctrine of exhausting reasonable administrative agency provisions prior to action by courts.

The 4-month limitation in the House bill also relates to restrictions imposed by unions rather than the rules of judicial administration or the action of Government agencies. For example, the National Labor Relations Board is not prohibited from entertaining charges by a member against a labor organization even though 4 months has not elapsed.

DISCIPLINARY ACTION

The so-called bill of rights title also secures important procedural safeguards against improper disciplinary action against union members as members. The Senate should note, however, that all the conferees agreed that this provision does not relate to suspension or removal from a union office. Often this step must be taken summarily to prevent dissipation or misappropriation of funds. In practice it is usually followed by a hearing.

TIME OF FILING REPORTS—TITLE II

The first financial reports which unions are required to file, and the first reports to be made by union officers, and employees under title II will cover only the period after the date the act becomes effective until the end of their first fiscal year which occurs after such effective date. Activities and transactions which occurred prior to the effective date of the act will not have to be reported.

ELECTIONS AND MEMBERSHIP LISTS

The provisions requiring fair and periodic elections are taken from the Senate bill. The Landrum-Griffin bill would have substituted a variety of suits by individual members for enforcement by the Secretary of Labor. The House conferees receded from this position and the Senate provision was restored.

A second important change in the election title relates to the use of membership lists. The Senate bill required a union to mail out to all members campaign literature submitted by candidates, at the candidate's expense, but there was no requirement that the candidate be given access to membership lists. Past experience demonstrates that unless lists of union members are kept confidential, they fall into the hands of employers who may use them for the purpose of breaking up the union, and into the hands of subversive organizations and commercial enterprises. The House bill would have required the disclosure of lists of members employed under union security contracts to any candidate despite these dangers. The conference report limits the right of the candidate to inspecting such a list once within 30 days prior to the election, and it prohibits the candidate from copying the names and addresses. The right to inspect will be important as a way of checking the accuracy of the union's mailing list, for the candidate will thus be enabled to ascertain whether the union has in fact mailed his campaign literature to those whom he knows to be union members. The inspection is not to enable him to have a copy. The mere fact that a local union has members covered by such agreements does not mean that the national or international union of which it is a constituent unit is required to keep and make available for inspection a list of all of its members, nor does this section require that federations of labor organizations whose members are composed of national or international unions, rather than individual members, are required to maintain and make available for inspection a list of all their individual members.

I do not wish to detain the Senate unduly, but these matters are extremely important. I think it is important that we have this opportunity to establish clearly the intent of the Senate on some of these points.

FIDUCIARY RESPONSIBILITY—SECTION 501

The general principles stated in the bill are familiar to the courts, both State and Federal, and therefore incorporate a large body of existing law applicable to trustees, and a wide variety of agents. The detailed application of these fiduciary principles to a particular trustee, officer, or agent has always depended upon the character of the activity in which he was engaged. They bear upon a family trustee somewhat differently than a corporate director, upon an attorney quite differently than a real estate agent. The bill wisely takes note of the need to consider "the special problems and functions of a labor organization" in applying fiduciary principles to their officers and agents.

The bill does not limit in any way the purposes for which the funds of a labor organization may be expended or the investments which can be made. Such decisions should be made by the members in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of their union. Union officers will not be guilty of breach of trust under this section when their expenditures are within the authority conferred upon them either by the constitution and bylaws, or by a resolution of the executive board, convention or other appropriate governing body—including a general meeting of the members—not in conflict with the constitution and bylaws. This is also made clear by the fact that section 501(a) requires that the special problems and functions of a labor organization be taken into consideration in determining whether union officers and other representatives are acting responsibly in connection with their statutory duties. The problems with which labor organizations are accustomed to deal are not limited to bread-and-butter unionism or to organization and collective bargaining alone, but encompass a broad spectrum of social objectives as the union may determine.

However, the committee bill also explicitly invalidates any general provision in a union constitution or bylaws purporting to excuse union officials from breaches of trust. The bill follows the well-established distinction between conferring authority upon an agent or trustee, which is permissible and protects him against liability, and attempting to excuse breaches of trust, which is here made void as against public policy.

ORGANIZATIONAL PICKETING—SECTION 704

Two of the three restrictions upon organizational picketing are taken from the Senate bill. Paragraphs (A) and (B) of the new section 8(b)(7), which is added to the National Labor Relations Act, prohibit picketing for union organization or recognition at times when the National Labor Relations Board would not conduct an election. Subdivision (A) covers the situation where a contract with another union is a bar to an election. If the contract is not a bar, either because the incumbent union was recognized improperly or lacked majority support, or because the contract had run for a reasonable period, a question concerning representation could appropriately be raised and subdivision (A) would not bar the picketing. Subdivision (B) bars picketing for organizational purposes or union recognition for 12 months after an election in order to secure the expressed desire of the employees. In both cases the prohibitions relate only to picketing in an effort to organize employees or secure recognition in a bargaining unit covered by the existing contract or the prior election.

The restriction added by the House which was approved in conference prohibits picketing, which involves economic coercion through employees, for more than 30 days without filing a petition for an election.

HOT CARGO—SECTION 704(B)

The first proviso under new section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act is intended to preserve the present state of the law with respect to picketing at the site of a construction project and with respect to the validity of agreements relating to the contracting of work to be done at the site of a construction project.

This proviso affects only section 8(e) and therefore leaves unaffected the law developed under section 8(b)(4). The Denver Building Trades (341 U.S. 675) and the Moore Drydock (92 N.L.R.B. 547) cases would remain in force.

Agreements by which a contractor in the construction industry promises not to subcontract work on a construction site to a nonunion contractor appear to be legal today. They will not be unlawful under section 8(e). The proviso is also applicable to all other agreements involving undertakings not to do work on a construction project site with other contractors or subcontractors regardless of the precise relation between them. Since the proviso does not relate to section 8(b)(4), strikes and picketing to enforce the contracts excepted by the proviso will continue to be illegal under section 8(b)(4) whenever the Sand Door case (357 U.S. 93) is applicable.

It is not intended to change the law with respect to the judicial enforcement of these contracts, or with respect to the legality of a strike to obtain such a contract.

It should be particularly noted that the proviso relates only to the "contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction." The proviso does not cover boycotts of goods manufactured in an industrial plant for installation at the jobsite, or suppliers who do not work at the jobsite.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to finish his statement before he answers questions?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. I should like to say one final word to the Senate, in conclusion.

First, the bill is not the bill I should have preferred to see passed by Congress. The House of Representatives went in a different direction from the Senate. The question was, What action should the Senate take? There are those who feel that it would have been wiser if the Senate had never gone to conference and had instead passed the Landrum-Griffin bill 2 weeks ago. Those who may feel that that would have been a wise decision would have made the greatest mistake of their lives if they voted for that bill. They would not have had the vaguest idea of what was in the Landrum-Griffin bill. It took 2 weeks for the conference to fully understand the meaning of all the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin bill.

Second, I think it is fair to say that the House Members of the conference—and I think they will agree—did not know all the implications of the Landrum-Griffin bill.

The fact of the matter is that the Landrum-Griffin bill was not reported by a committee of the House. It was offered as a substitute on the floor of the House. It came up in a debate on the Elliott bill, and both the Shelley and the Landrum-Griffin bill were also before the House. Three conflicting bills, each running dozens of pages in length, and involving cross-references to court decisions and to provisions of laws were before the House. It would not be any wonder that most of the Members of the House could not have known what the provisions of the House bill contained. Therefore, I think if the Landrum-Griffin bill had been passed, it would have been one of the greatest mistakes we could have made.

Once having decided to go to conference, we stayed in conference until we came back here to the Senate Friday night. Four Senate conferees submitted a resolution suggesting what we wanted in title VII. Everything which we wanted in the bill on Friday night, with one exception, is now in the Landrum-Griffin bill, or the Kennedy-Ervin bill, or S. 1555, the labor-management reform bill of 1959, as I would much prefer to call it.

All the provisions and words, with the exception of the words "and other integrated industries," are in the bill. We tried to take care of the problems of other integrated industries, like the garment industry. For example, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] was extremely anxious to protect the practices in the coal industry. The senior Senator from West Virginia objectively approached the problems of the conference from the national aspect. Yet he was keenly aware of and appropriately sought to protect the rights and interests of the dominant industry of his State in proposing amendments to cushion the impact on the labor-management relations between the coal producers and the miners' union. He offered an amendment relating to the coal industry on three different occasions. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and I voted for it. We were unable to persuade the House to accept it. But the point of the matter is that we were able to gain acceptance of the proposals which were in our resolution of last week, Senate Resolution 181, with the one exception that I have mentioned. We were also able to add two additional important provisions.

We have secured a commitment from the leadership of the House and Senate that in January a bill which the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] and I will introduce tonight, and which Representative THOMPSON will offer in the House, on the Denver case, concerning situs picketing, will come to the floors of the House and Senate.

In my opinion, considering the Landrum-Griffin bill and considering what we have now, I think substantial progress was made, progress of the most important kind. It might have been better to have brought the matter to the floor of the Senate a week ago and let the Senate debate it. But the Senate sent us to conference to have us attempt to render our best judgment.

The Parliamentarian has informed me that only once, I believe, in the time he has been here have conferees come back to the Senate for instructions. Therefore, it seems to me it was our job to attempt to do the best we could.

I am frank to say that I do not think the Senate would have reached a more satisfactory solution. It is very possible that after 4 or 5 days of long, drawn-out debate in the Senate, a motion would have been made to have the Senate accept the Landrum-Griffin bill in toto; and in frustration and fear we would have ended with a bill so different from the House bill that we would not have gotten a reform bill. We might have ended with the Landrum-Griffin bill or no bill at all.

So as a member either of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare or the House Committee on Education and Labor for 13 years, I have no apologies at all for the bill we are now bringing before the Senate.

I believe that any Senator, regardless of his views on these matters, can vote for the conference report. I do not claim that it is a perfect bill or that it is a model of fairness. But, taking it as a whole, it is the best bill we can pass.

I hope that Senators, regardless of any misgivings which they may have concerning some provisions of the bill, and which I have, will see fit to endorse the work which the conference has done.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Massachusetts has almost answered the question I had in mind about the Denver case. I gather from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Denver case will be under consideration in the next session. Is that his intent?

Mr. KENNEDY. When I have concluded my remarks, I will introduce a bill dealing with the Denver case. It will be introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] and myself and will lie on the desk for several days in the hope that other Senators will cosponsor it. I have received the assurances of the majority leader and the minority leader that if the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare reports the bill, they will schedule it. Likewise, both the Speaker of the House and Representative HALLECK have said that they will use their influence to secure a rule for the consideration of the bill if the House Committee on Education and Labor reports it.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Were any hearings ever held on the Denver case in relationship to this bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. Also, the Denver case was in the Elliott bill. But because the Senate committee wanted to confine its bill to labor reform and not deal with the whole matter of Taft-Hartley reform, we did not include it in the Senate bill.

When the House Parliamentarian informed us that a point of order would lie, we did not include the Denver case proposal in the report. We might have had a fair vote on the Denver case in the Senate, but recognizing the fact that a point of order would lie in the House against this provision, we felt that by including it in the conference report the possibility of relief in the Denver case would have been set back rather than advanced.

Mr. CARROLL. Were any hearings held in the House on the Denver case?

Mr. KENNEDY. The situs matter was dealt with in the Elliott bill; therefore, in their deliberations in the hearings on that bill and in conference the House discussed the situs.

Mr. CARROLL. I commend the distinguished chairman of the conference committee. I think he has done excellent work on a very difficult bill.

Is it not true that most of the confusion in both the Landrum-Griffin bill and the bill under consideration arises under section 7 and not in the first six sections?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. If Senators will take comparative prints of the first six sections of the Senate bill and the House bill, they will see that some changes have been made in all of them. The improvements in the first six sections of both bills follow the same course.

Mr. CARROLL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts agree that the first six sections of this measure have to do with the curbing of racketeering and corruption?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. So section 7 is not really related to the basic problem with which the so-called rackets investigation committee dealt when it conducted its hearings during the past few years; is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. I wish to ask about the so-called no-man's land. If I correctly understand the situation, for the first time since enactment of the Wagner Act—almost 25 years ago—the Congress is regulating all the unions and is requiring them to make reports. Congress is regulating their internal processes, and will require financial reporting by them. Under this measure, all of them will be required to make reports. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. As I recall the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, although the policy regarding the jurisdiction of the NLRB will be a little more liberal than the one we have had since 1935, there still will be a great area where those who are entitled to the protection of the Federal Government, will not be able to obtain that protection, because of the conference no-man's land provision. Is not that true?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have not had a chance to study this matter until recently.

This measure does modify the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Guss against Utah; does it not?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; that would be its effect.

Mr. CARROLL. Yes; because now—for the first time—we begin to soften the so-called doctrine of preemption; and we say to the National Labor Relations Board, "We, the Congress, specify that you must assume jurisdiction of this area."

Is not that so?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would state it somewhat differently. As the Senator from Colorado knows, the National Labor Relations Board has not assumed jurisdiction over quite a considerable area of American interstate commerce, for 25 years, because of the manpower problems which would be involved if the Board took jurisdiction over numerous cases which do not have a very substantial effect on interstate commerce.

In 1959 the Board published jurisdictional standards which, as the Senator has said, resulted in the Board's assuming more jurisdiction over interstate commerce than the Board ever before in its history had assumed. But those not now covered by the jurisdictional standards of the National Labor Relations Board have never been included in its jurisdiction.

We attempted to secure adoption of the Prouty amendment, for which I voted. It provided that in the so-called no-man's land, the State courts and State agencies would administer the Federal law. But that amendment was not accepted.

Therefore, it seems to me that we did the next best thing; we provided that the States could assume jurisdiction in that area; but we made sure that the Board would not reverse itself and reject cases over which it now assumes jurisdiction.

But we point out that when we provide that the States can assume jurisdiction in this area, we must bear in mind that 35 of the States have no adequate labor laws. In that connection, I assure the Senator from Colorado that I shall watch very carefully what actions are taken by these various States, because if any effort is made to use this provision as an opportunity to limit rights which all of us believe all American working people and employers in these States have, then it will be very easy under this provision for the National Labor Relations Board by administrative decision to assume much fuller jurisdiction.

So I believe this matter is not gone beyond recall. The Board can change its jurisdictional standards, and can, at any time, assume more jurisdiction; but it cannot assume less jurisdiction than it does today.

Once again, we arrived at a compromise; and I would say that, very definitely, it is a satisfactory one, all in all.

Mr. CARROLL. I believe that is exactly what should be done.

In reading the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Guss versus Utah, I note that the decision states that the Congress is free to change the situation at will; and the Court also said that in 1954 the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare recognized the existence of a no-man's land, and proposed an amendment which would have empowered State courts and agencies to act upon the National Labor Relations Board's refusal of jurisdiction.

What happened to that amendment, which came out of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare? Why was it not enacted then, if we sought to protect the workers?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think that bill—the 1954 bill—was recommitted.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his helpfulness.

I know that as a most important member of the committee, and because of his keen interest and his great leadership in this field, the Senator from Massachusetts has been most helpful to all of us.

But I must still say that it is manifestly unfair to those workers who are excluded from Federal protection. I do not know how many are in this group. I do not know whether there are 1 million or 5 million workers who are denied this protection. The reform bill which now is before us will not protect the workers in this area, but it will require the small unions to file financial and other reports. I am glad to know that the Federal Government will extend its jurisdiction to some small unions for the first time in 25 years, but I am sorry that others will still not be able to have the benefit of the National Labor Relations Act.

I commend the Senator from Massachusetts for his expression today. This subject is of vital importance, but not many of us understand labor law. We are not experts in this field. We have to dig hard in order to obtain the facts.

But this one fact is clear.

If I may be so presumptuous as to say so, I do not believe many Members of this body—except the members of the committee—have had a chance to fully understand what this measure provides in connection with the no-man's-land problem. How many of us understand that not more than 8, 10, or 12 States have labor laws which will provide the workers the protection they need? In many States, the workers will be thrown back to reliance on the common law. In many of those States, the State laws are very backward in their treatment of both labor and management.

That is why I believe it most unfortunate that we have to pass on section 7 without proper consideration or proper hearings.

But I agree completely with the Senator from Massachusetts that this is the best measure we could get under the circumstances, considering the propaganda and the pressures placed upon the Congress.

But it is most unfortunate that we have to act under these conditions.

However, not having acted in an orderly and intelligent manner—as I know the Senator from Massachusetts wanted us to act—we now find it necessary to have a more restrictive and less carefully considered bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senator from Colorado has brought up this point, because it gives me an opportunity to say something which I might not otherwise have said.

If the 35 States which do not now have State labor agencies which can handle representation proceedings, and so on, determine that the atmosphere of the country is such that punitive legislation is wanted as regards these employees and employers who are engaged in interstate commerce, but who in a sense are being turned over by the Federal Government to the States—if those States feel that this provision is going to serve as an excuse for the passage of laws which would deny them what both the Senate and the House of Representatives, I am sure, would feel would be their rights, then there are several remedies. The first is by having the National Labor Relations Board broaden its jurisdiction—which can be done under our bill. The second is by having the President recommend the reorganization of the Board, so it can handle these cases. The third is by having the Congress make it very clear that the Board must assume its full jurisdiction.

So I want to make it clear that these employees are not being placed beyond our control, because the Senate and the House of Representatives can move into this area immediately; and I assure the Senator from Colorado that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will do so, and will watch with care any State laws which these States may pass, which affect these employees.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, again I assure the Senator from Massachusetts and the other members of the committee, who worked so very hard on this measure, that I realize this is a very difficult field. I say frankly that if I had not had the benefit of the explanation by the Senator from Massachusetts, and if I did not now understand a little more clearly what the true situation is, I would vote against this bill. I think that we should meet the problems of racketeering and corruption.

All of us favor curbing racketeers and corruption. But this measure involves criminal law and the regulation of both unions and management. When we get into the highly technical field of economic democracy and labor and management relations, we should give it thorough study.

In view of the statements which have been made by the Senator from Massachusetts and by other Senators, I do not believe sufficient study was given to the Landrum-Griffin bill; and, frankly, I do not believe that sufficient study was given by this body, either.

Nevertheless, under the circumstances we are going to have to march forward. Again I commend the Senator from Massachusetts. I state frankly that I am willing to proceed with this bill, with the assurance that the Denver case will be reconsidered. I will join the Senator as regards that case. Very few Members of this body understand the law involved in that case. I have one further question to put. As I understood it the Denver case involved new matter and therefore would be subject to a point of order in the House. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. How can the Denver case be distinguished from the garment workers' case? Did not the latter also involve new matter, and was it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. KENNEDY. That question was raised. I received an informal judgment from the Parliamentarian and others that a point of order would not lie against that section of the bill. Also all House Members stated very vigorously their conviction that it should not lie. They also stated vigorously—Chairman BARDEN in particular—that it should lie against the Denver case. While nothing is certain, my opinion is that a point of order will not be made or be sustained against the garment industry provision.

Mr. CARROLL. I am sure it will not be. It is too bad the Denver case could not have been brought in, and we could have found out about it. It is a very simple case. The Denver case involved members of a craft union working on a big building. An electrical company, paying 42 cents an hour under the prevailing wage received a subcontract. The building trade workers—carpenters, bricklayers, and the rest—said, "We refuse to work alongside them." That was the basic issue involved, as I remember it. The court held against them.

This was a new concept. We had never had this trouble before. For over 20 years we did not have trouble in this area in any case, until this happened. The company had men who were working for 42 cents an hour under the wage scale.

I join the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from California in the expression that we ought to work on this problem in next session, and we also ought to work on some of the defects in this bill.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am delighted the Senator brought this point up.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that the conference report bill is not the bill he preferred, but he feels it is the best bill that could have been obtained under all the circumstances.

The Senator from Colorado has well said that anyone who has worked or labored in the field of labor-management, endeavoring to write legislation in that field, knows how complex and difficult it is to write adequate, fair, and just legislation in that field.

Mr. President, I felt that the Senate conferees on this bill are entitled to the thanks and the congratulations of the Senate for their long, hard, and arduous labors, and for the good will and understanding and statesmanship they brought to bear in the conference.

The distinguished chairman of the conference, the Senator from Massachusetts, is entitled to the special thanks of this body for his patience, his courage, his devotion, and his wise leadership, which contributed so greatly to the bringing of this conference report to the Senate today. I warmly congratulate and commend him for the fine work that he has done.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. On page 20 of the report, in relation to the prohibition against certain persons holding office, among other things, section 504 states:

> No person who is or has been a member of the Communist Party or who has been convicted.

And so forth. What is the definition of Communist Party? Would the definition be determined by prior rulings of the National Labor Relations Board or by the Attorney General, or what would be the definition?

Mr. KENNEDY. This language was taken from the House bill. As the Senator will remember, under the present language, an affidavit has to be filed. That was felt to be awkward. Therefore, such persons would fall under the general prohibition, but the definition would have to be made by the courts. The courts would have to determine the question.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I ask the question to clear up the matter. There may be an adequate explanation for this, but further in the report it is provided that this matter may be brought before the Board and the Board's determination in any such proceeding shall be final.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are talking about two different things. In one case we are talking about the question of a convict who may have been paroled and who might want to serve as a union officer; but, as to the Senator's question, the determination would have to be made by the court.

Mr. President, before yielding the floor, I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA], who has had long experience in the labor-management field; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], both of whom participated in this difficult conference; and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who disagrees with us, but who labored diligently in this field for 2 years, a very constant companion in this most difficult task. I appreciate his efforts.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as one of the Senate conferees who sat for 12 days in the conference on the labor bill between the House and Senate, I am pleased we have reached agreement on a bill which, I believe, will not only merit overwhelming approval of both Houses of Congress, but most of all, will fully meet the demand that the American people have emphatically made upon us for the enactment of a strong and effective labor reform bill.

Mr. President, the conference report before us today carries out, in substance, all of the recommendations contained in the McClellan committee interim report of March 1958. In addition, this conference report contains provisions which strike at the heart of the racketeering, hoodlumism, and gangsterism in the union movement so dramatically revealed during the two and one-half years of hearings held by the McClellan committee.

First, I would like to read to the Senate the five legislative recommendations made in the first interim report. These recommendations are:

1. LEGISLATION TO REGULATE AND CONTROL PENSION, HEALTH AND WELFARE FUNDS

Last year Congress enacted a bill to require filing of reports on the management of union pension and welfare funds. This year, using the Landrum-Griffin bill's language, we require bonding of officials who handle all union funds, requiring of them high standards of fiduciary responsibility. I will explain this in connection with the next McClellan committee recommendation.

2. LEGISLATION TO REGULATE AND CONTROL UNION FUNDS

In four major areas, the bill which we agreed to in conference gives full force and meaning to the McClellan committee recommendation for the regulation and control of union funds, by the adoption of provisions in the Landrum-Griffin House-passed bill.

We deleted the Senate provision granting an exemption from reporting for small unions because the McClellan committee report made no distinction between large and small unions and, in fact, some of the worst abuses uncovered involved smaller unions. Thus, under the conference bill, members of small locals are given the same opportunity to know how their money is being spent as are members of large unions.

We dropped the provision in the Senate bill which would have required only those union officers and employees receiving more than $5,000 a year from the union to report any conflict of interest transactions in which they may be involved. We agreed to the House provision requiring all officers and employees to report conflict of interest transactions because it is our belief that the Senate provision would have created a major loophole by means of which the crooks and shady operators could have evaded the filing requirements to the detriment of the honest union members.

While both the Senate and House bills contained a provision requiring every union officer who handles funds or property to be bonded, the Senate bill would have permitted blanket bonding with a maximum bond of $250,000. The House provision was much stricter, requiring personal bonding of not less than 10 percent of the amount handled by the union officer. An additional safeguard of the House provision prohibited the placing of the bond with a surety company in which an officer or employee of the union had any interest. The conferees originally agreed to the House provision but subsequently adopted an amendment which I offered, striking out the 10 percent minimum and making the maximum amount $500,000. There are many unions with pension and welfare funds totaling hundreds of millions of dollars. To require a bond of 10 percent of such funds would be unrealistic and burdensome.

A further strengthening provision of the House bill which the conferees adopted dealt with the fiduciary responsibility imposed upon union officers. The McClellan committee recommendations on regulation and control of union funds specifically stated that:

> Since union-dues moneys, as well as health and welfare funds, are in actuality a trust, being held for the members of the union by their officers, the committee feels that attention should be given to placing certain restrictions of the use of these funds, such as are now imposed on banks and other institutions which act as repositories and administrators for trust funds.

This type of legislation, in the committee's opinion, would go a long way toward preventing wholesale misappropriation and misuse of union funds such as that disclosed by committee testimony.

While the Senate bill imposed a fiduciary responsibility upon union officers, the House bill in addition gave the union member a right to bring suit in court against a union officer to recover damages growing out of a breach of fiduciary responsibility.

3. LEGISLATION TO INSURE UNION DEMOCRACY

Mr. President, the third McClellan committee recommendation was legislation to insure union democracy.

While both bills effectively carried out this recommendation, the Conferees adopted a very important provision contained in the House bill. It guarantees to every bona fide candidate for union office the right to inspect a list containing the names and addresses of all members of the union who are covered by a union shop contract. Such a provision, in my opinion, is a long stride forward in equalizing the balance between candidates running for union office, now so heavily weighted on the side of incumbents.

4. LEGISLATION TO CURB ACTIVITIES OF MIDDLEMEN IN LABOR-MANAGEMENT DISPUTES

Mr. President, the fourth McClellan committee recommendation was legislation to curb activities of middlemen in labor-management disputes.

In this area, both the Senate and House bills, by requiring detailed reports from employers and labor relations consultants, effectively controls the Shefferman type operation spotlighted by the McClellan committee. We borrowed language from both bills in order to achieve our desired objective.

5. LEGISLATION TO CLARIFY THE NO MAN'S LAND IN LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. President, the fifth McClellan committee recommendation was legislation to clarify no man's land in labor-management relations.

The McClellan committee was very explicit in recommending that:

> The NLRB should exercise its jurisdiction to the greatest extent practicable, and, further, that any State or Territory should be authorized to assume and assert jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the Board declines jurisdiction.

The Senate bill attempted to solve the no man's land problem by allowing State labor relations boards—but not State courts—to take jurisdiction over cases declined by the NLRB. The State board, however, would have to apply Federal law. Only 12 States have labor boards and even those States would have to pass legislation allowing the board to apply Federal law. Obviously, this treatment of the no man's land offered no solution to the problem.

The House provision, which was agreed to by the conferees, specifically carries out the recommendation of the McClellan committee by authorizing State labor boards and courts to assume jurisdiction and to apply State law in cases over which the NLRB declines to assert jurisdiction. The conferees added a provision requiring the NLRB to continue to take cases meeting its present standards.

Mr. President, judging from the colloquy I have heard today on the no man's land, we must keep this in mind: Up until 2 years ago, when the Guss decision was handed down by the Supreme Court, we had no such thing as a no man's land. The State courts were taking care of these cases, and there was no problem in the field. So we are not trying something new, Mr. President; we are merely going back to that which was in effect all the years we have had labor law up until 1957, when the Guss decision of the Supreme Court preempted the State area.

I think my colleagues fear rather wrongly in this direction. To me this is one of the most important recommendations of the McClellan committee, in that it will give relief to the small businessmen. Those are the people about whom we are concerned. We are not interested in State court action in cases which apply to interstate commerce, because it is clear those are involved in interstate commerce and it is clear that the NLRB must take jurisdiction. I am talking about the little grocery store, the service station, or the main street merchant who cannot get relief from the NLRB but who will now be able to get relief from the local and State courts.

Mr. President, I should like to discuss next the field of secondary boycotts, hot cargo agreements, and recognition and organizational picketing.

Some of the most shocking of the revelations of the McClellan committee involve the use of secondary boycotts and recognition and organizational picketing as a weapon of extortion, terror, and intimidation. Many small main street businessmen were forced to their knees by the use of these tactics and were either forced out of business or else succumbed to the unions' demands. In all such cases the interests and desires of the employees involved as to whether they wished to be unionized were never considered.

The people of this country have reacted to this sordid condition and have expressed themselves in no uncertain terms in one of the greatest avalanches of mail from irate constituents Representatives and Senators have ever received. The demand is uniform—they want immediate relief from this exercise of coercive power.

The House bill carried out this mandate by closing up the loopholes in secondary boycotts and by banning recognition and organizational picketing. With some clarifying provisions, the conferees adopted the House bill on secondary boycotts, hot cargo agreements, and recognition and organizational picketing.

The Senate bill did not deal with the subject of secondary boycotts. The House bill, however, closed up every loophole in the boycott section of the law including the use of a secondary consumer picket line, an example of which the President gave on his nationwide TV program on August 6.

Only hot cargo agreements between a union and a common carrier were banned by the Senate bill; the House bill extended this ban to all unions and employers by making them illegal, unenforcible and void. Because of the persuasive arguments made our colleagues, the Senators from New York [Mr. JAVITS and Mr. KEATING] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the Republican conferees were persuaded to support the addition of a provision exempting the garment industry from the prohibitions on boycotts and hot cargo agreements.

In the field of recognition and organizational picketing, the Senate bill prohibited picketing for these purposes for 9 months after an election or when another union had been certified or lawfully recognized. This was all. The Landrum-Griffin bill went further—it restricted picketing unless the union could show a 30 percent interest among the employees and then allowed it only for a reasonable period of time, not exceeding 30 days. The conferees adopted the substance of the House provisions except for the 30 percent showing of interest requirement.

All in all, the sentiment expressed so overwhelmingly by the House in approving the Landrum-Griffin bill was again manifested by the conference, which adopted the basic Landrum-Griffin bill with a few clarifications and modifications. The bill that we have agreed upon carries out President Eisenhower's urgent request for labor reform legislation.

The bill carries out not only the recommendations of the McClellan committee, but it also reflects the provisions of the bill introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] which was used as a guide in drafting the Landrum-Griffin measure substantially adopted by the conference.

Mr. President, we might think, today, as we cast our votes for the conference report, that our work is done.

Mr. President, this is not so. We have further work to do in this field. I do not want to delay the Senate long on this point, because I have made it often. We have work to be done in the field embodying one word, and that word is "power."

Let us examine this point of power briefly. Unions are granted privileges by the Federal Government which are granted no other segment of our society. It would take a man of extremely high character to avoid exploiting these privileges, for they include immunity under the antitrust laws, practically full immunity from injunctions in the Federal courts, immunity from taxation, power to compel employees to join a union as a condition of employment, the right to represent all the employees as exclusive bargaining agent even if only a bare majority has selected the union as such agent; power to compel employers to bargain collectively. Although not required to be incorporated, their members are free from liability for the debts of the union.

Unlike the members of other unincorporated associations, unions are not liable for the acts of their individual members, in contrast to other types of unincorporated associations. Employers are prohibited from discriminating in the hire and tenure of employment against employees because of their union membership or their union activities, including participation in picketing and strikes. Employers are forbidden, however, to engage in lockouts except in two unimportant types of situations. Unions have the right to collective bargaining, to compel the employer in some circumstances to disclose his financial books and records, but there is no corresponding obligation on unions.

The unions in some situations have a legal right of access to the employer's property, the right to compel him to make his property available for use by the union, and the right to invade the privacy of the employees who are not union members, and sometimes even against their wishes.

Mr. President, as I have said on previous occasions, it is this power, and the abuse of this power, legally vested in the union movement, which is the basis of corruption exposed by the McClellan committee.

It is not necessary to mention, Mr. President, about the power vested in the offices which these men hold which is the core of the problem.

If we direct our efforts at this problem, then we will be dealing with the basis of labor corruption. If we do not apply ourselves in this direction, we are only dealing with the symptoms and are hoodwinking the public as well as ourselves.

Mr. President, in order not to detain the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of an article written by Mr. Edward H. Chamberlain and David Wells, professor of political economy at Harvard University, be inserted at this point in my remarks, and I might add, Mr. President, that this is a part of a book every Senator should read, "The Public Stake in Union Power," which was written by 12 outstanding professors in the field of law and economics, published at the University of Virginia.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Why is industrial monopoly, by general agreement, against the social interest? And why have we in this country been particularly active in trying to control it? Because it creates a maldistribution of resources, is a common answer. This is a sophisticated argument, which incidentally applies equally to labor monopoly. A monopoly of building materials raises the cost of building and so discourages the construction industry. So does a monopoly of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters hauling building materials in the construction industry. No difference. Either one maldistributes resources as between the construction and other industries.

But I believe the chief source of objection to industrial monopoly is in the matter of incomes—in its exploitation of the public through charging what are generally regarded as unduly high prices and deriving therefrom an excessive income. People do not like to be held up. In more technical terms, the business monopolist by raising his price produces less and yet increases his aggregate income. This means that the social dividend is smaller, and that with his own increased money income he is able to buy a larger portion of it. The net effect on others is adverse in both respects: they get a smaller portion of a smaller total.

Let us turn this argument around and try it on the labor field. The New York multimillion-dollar construction industry has been at a standstill for several weeks from a strike of 3,500 truckdrivers. A portion of these, the sand and gravel drivers, have settled (in the midst of a recession, and in a labor market where supply exceeds demand by over 5 million according to the latest figures) for (roughly) a 12-percent increase (over 2 years) plus freight benefits, bringing their wage rate to well over $3 an hour (or about $25 a day), and the others are holding out for the same increase. I can see no reason why they will not get it, for by bringing the entire industry to a virtual standstill they have demonstrated their power to inflict untold damage as the alternative, and there is no reason why they cannot go on almost indefinitely. Their ability to obtain such an increase, and in the face of substantial unemployment, is evidently based on a position of power. And it is far greater in this case than that of the industrial monopolist. But more of this later. The point here is that the cost and hence the price of construction is correspondingly raised so that less construction will be done, and that the income of the truck drivers is increased. On the one hand, the social dividend is smaller, and on the other, the drivers with their increased money incomes are able to buy a larger portion of it.

It is of prime importance to note that this argument, unlike the earlier one, is not confined to the labor market, thus representing the gains of union labor as being at the expense of other laborers. On the contrary, it recognizes that the gains of labor monopoly are, like the gains of any other monopoly, at the expense of all other elements of society, in other words, of the general public. This is so because the higher prices resulting from higher labor costs are paid by consumers generally. And they are paid by those of all income groups, including the lowest. The real incomes of all are diminished for the benefit of a particular group of laborers. The principle involved is extremely simple. There is no mystery about it, and labor monopoly is in this respect no different from any other monopoly.

This proposition is, however, the last thing which organized labor will want to admit, since unions depend heavily on public favor, and must persuade the general public that labor interest and public interest are simply two different names for the same thing. So it is that Walter Reuther even invites the public in, like one of the neighbors, to have a cut in the hypothetical raid which he will engineer on automobile profits. This is economic warfare, of course, and nobody can blame Mr. Reuther for sending up a smoke screen of this sort if he thinks it will help him. But I am afraid that, no matter what judgment one may pass on profits in the automobile industry, higher labor costs will in the end be added to the price of automobiles. We ought to look through the smokescreen if we can.

In sum, the objection from a public point of view to labor monopoly is no whit different from the familiar objection to industrial monopoly. Certainly the public does not enjoy being held up by truckdrivers any more than it does by, say, the railroads. But the difference is that it is more aware of railway rates and hence has developed over many years a machinery for controlling them in the public interest, whereas in the wage field it appears hardly to be aware at all of what happens. Indeed, it is not too much to say that there is a widespread positive aversion to finding out and to recognizing the full extent and significance of labor monopoly power, since this would do violence to one of the most cherished of popular beliefs, viz, that the labor cause is unqualifiedly good.

There are many reasons why the public is virtually immune to an awareness of labor monopoly, some of them connected with points made earlier in this paper, for instance, the heavy tradition that wages are by their very nature highly competitive, that labor is the "underdog," etc. But one very fundamental reason is that the wage bill is paid immediately by an employer and only finally and indirectly by the public through the mechanism of the cost structure on which the prices are based. Although the main principles involved in the law of cost do not seem very difficult to anyone trained in economics, they are, nevertheless, sufficiently remote to be difficult for the average citizen. And nothing is easier than for him to sympathize with the laborers who get the higher wages, since this objective seems desirable per se and is directly translatable into his own economic world: he would like to have higher wages himself. A banal plea for economic education is evidently in order. But let me restrict myself to a plea for a revived emphasis in economic theory and in the elementary course on economic structure, on microeconomics if you will, as against the aggregative and the "macro." No doubt both are important, but it does seem to me that a major consequence of the Keynesian onslaught has been to put a very bad squeeze on the study of what used to be called the theory of value.

An important difference, then, between monopoly power in the hands of labor and in the hands of business is that the former is more easily covered up—buried in the cost structure and forgotten. It does not take much imagination to realize that this is one of the chief sources of its strength: those who might otherwise oppose it are less aware of it.

There are in addition other sources of strength beyond those attributable to mere collective action per se. I have dealt elsewhere with some of them under the headings of "Accretions of Power" and will only summarize them here in passing. The main point is that they are peculiar to the labor market. They include (1) violence and intimidation, both actual and potential, (2) picketing as a phase of intimidation and also as a means of putting pressure on, or entering into collusion with, other unions, (3) boycotts, both secondary and primary, (4) compulsory unionism, and (5), perhaps the most important of all, the right, or at least the de facto power, in the case of a strike, to deny to an employer access to alternative bargains.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would not want to close without recognizing the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], and his long efforts in this body to obtain effective secondary boycott legislation. I can recall that as long as he has been here, knowing as he does the problems raised in the Coffey case in his own State of Nebraska, he has assigned himself assiduously to this task, and I should not want to finish without recognizing his efforts.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the Senator able to state to what extent the recommendations made by the McClellan committee are now embodied in the bill that is before the Senate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. As I said earlier in my discussion, they are all handled in this bill. They are not handled entirely in the way I think the Senator from Arkansas intended them to be, but they are in the conference bill. The no man's land has been taken care of. The abuse of picketing has been taken care of. The democratic process, the fiduciary responsibility, and the like, have all been included in the bill. The Senator in voting for it can rest assured the substance and the weight of the McClellan committee are in the bill.

I voted against the Kennedy-Ervin bill only because it did not have those provisions in it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is, the Senator from Arizona voted against the Kennedy-Ervin bill because it did not adequately take care of organizational picketing, secondary boycotting, the elimination of the area where there was no law, with the courthouse doors nailed shut and the lawless not controlled?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I felt the provisions in the first title relative to the democratic processes, reporting, and so forth, were good. I did not agree that they were strong enough, but they were good. I voted against the bill because it did not touch upon the suggestions made by the McClellan committee, which seven out of the eight members of that committee signed before it came to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in understanding then, that substantially the recommendations made by the McClellan committee are now in the conference bill, but that they were not in the bill when it was passed by the Senate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct in that statement.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. KEATING. The proposed labor law being pretty complicated, I am trying to simplify it somewhat. Has the distinguished Senator any idea of the number of changes made from the time the bill came to the floor from the Labor Committee up to the present time? How many changes have been made?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is a rather difficult question to answer specifically. If we take the original bill that was introduced in this body and say that that is the vehicle on which we constructed these other structures, then I believe the total changes would be in the neighborhood of 150.

Mr. KEATING. We made a good many here on the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe there were 37 made on the floor, some 104 in the House, and I think 45 to 50 in conference.

Mr. KEATING. Would it be a fair appraisal to say that the conference report is about 85 percent by weight and 90 percent by volume the Landrum-Griffin bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would leave that up to the Senator's judgment. I would not want to exercise whatever wisdom I have in that respect. I think the bill is a good bill. I think it is a bill that will do for the American people, the workingmen, what they want done for them.

Mr. KEATING. It does cover the three points, secondary boycott, organizational picketing, and a no man's land provision, which were not adequately dealt with in the bill before.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, in summing up, I wish to pay particular respect to Mr. Michael J. Bernstein, who is sitting here beside me on the floor. He was formerly chief counsel in the 83d Congress and since that time has served as minority counsel of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, ever since I have been on the committee, which is 7 years. His services are invaluable. I think I speak knowledgeably in stating that I do not know of another lawyer in the United States who understands the Taft-Hartley law as well as this man does. I am deeply indebted to him for his services to me and to the minority members. In fact, I would not dare talk about this subject without Mike being at my side.

I should also like to pay my respects to Mr. Ray Hurley and Fritz Randolph, of the minority staff, for the work they did for the minority Members.

I should like to pay my compliments to Prof. Archibald Cox, of Harvard University, who is here working with the committee. Professor Cox brings to us a great knowledge of labor law. He has an ability with words that was extremely valuable to us as we met in the conference to act on this proposed legislation.

I should also like to mention the House Members and the House staff who have been most cooperative and helpful in the formation of the conference report.

Mr. President, in closing, at the time of passage by the Senate of the Kennedy-Ervin bill I cast the lone negative vote. At that time I declared that the bill would mislead the public into the false belief that adequate measures had been adopted to cope with the evils they abhor.

I contended, in voting at that time, that I did not choose to be a party to this deception. I also declared that I regarded it as my duty, not only as a Senator but as an American citizen, to enlighten the public to the facts of the matter.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am extremely gratified with the events of the past few weeks. I applaud the work of the House, the response of the public, the encouragement of the President, and the efforts of the joint conferees in recognizing the need for adequate labor reform legislation.

We have now succeeded in putting together a bill which is a victory for the American people and for organized labor itself when we consider that organized labor is the workingman.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, first I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his kind reference to the junior Senator from Nebraska. Coming from the Senator from Arizona, I deeply appreciate this tribute, because no man in America has done more for the free men and women who make up our laboring force, and for honest unionism, than the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, in the 84th Congress I introduced a bill to outlaw secondary boycotts, "hot cargo" agreements, and organizational and recognitional picketing. I reintroduced it in the 85th Congress and in the 86th Congress. It is known as Senate bill 76, a bill to amend the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, and for other purposes.

I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be discharged from further consideration of Senate bill 76, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, across the Mall, not far from where I stand, is a recently constructed shaft of white marble. Built by the citizens of this land, it is a monument to one of the great men of our time, a man of intelligence and vision, integrity and courage, a courageous leader of this body, and one of the first citizens of this country. The bells of that memorial should ring out today.

The Nation is once again following the trail he blazed.

Twelve years ago, Robert A. Taft led the battle for needed reforms in the complex and controversial area of labor-management relations. Were he here with us now, he would once again be leading the fight for a just, but affirmative, resolution of these difficult problems.

Fortunately, there have been others who have been willing to undertake this controversial and sometimes unpopular task—the task of maintaining justice, responsibility, and balance in labor-management relations.

We now have before us a bill which reflects the contributions of many individuals. It is, in my judgment, a good bill. It meets the needs of the hour and these needs are very real. Yet, it meets these needs without harshness or discrimination. The bill before us represents a constructive step in solving one of the most vexing problems of our industrial society.

To catalog all those who have made contributions to this significant effort would require more time than I can take here this afternoon. Let me name only a few.

Preeminent on anyone's list of those who have unselfishly worked for constructive labor legislation, would be our distinguished colleague, JOHN MCCLELLAN, the senior Senator from Arkansas. If one man reflects, yes even embodies, the moral fiber of American people, it is JOHN MCCLELLAN. He has become a symbol of moral courage. His determination to carry through the work of his select committee, without regard to political pressures or opportunism, laid the ground work for the legislation that is before us today. If the bill before us is, as I believe it to be, an insistent expression of the will of the people, JOHN MCCLELLAN is in large part responsible for revealing to our citizens the violence, fraud and corruption that has spread through certain important areas of labor-management relations. Likewise I commend equally the work of the cochairman, Senator KARL MUNDT.

Other members of this body have contributed substantially. The distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] undertook the difficult assignment of serving this year on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, knowing full well that it was a year of legislative decision. His work on that committee in the conference just ended, has been outstanding and will remain as a fine example of a courageous willingness to accept a difficult role at a critical time, a role that lesser men would have avoided.

Also there is that militant crusader from Arizona, my friend and colleague [Mr. GOLDWATER]. His untiring efforts to break the strangle hold which the hoodlums and the racketeers have held on certain segments of the American labor movement, are well known. No one has worked harder than he has for this cause.

If time permitted, I could mention many others on both sides of the aisle. Then, of course, I would be remiss if I did not mention those on the other side of the Capitol who worked so hard to put together a bill which met the needs of the time. The cosponsors of the House bill, Mr. LANDRUM, of Georgia, and Mr. GRIFFIN, of Michigan, deserve the thanks of the entire country. They have given this measure a truly bipartisan stamp.

More than 4 years ago events in my own State of Nebraska impressed upon me the need for additional labor legislation. Jimmy Hoffa and his teamsters were running roughshod over small trucking concerns. Senators remember what has become one of the classic yet tragic stories of the oppression and injustice that can flow from the use of unbridled power in the hands of a few arrogant and despotic labor leaders. The story of the Coffey Transfer Co., of Alma, Nebr., received national publicity because it represented an example of a small business being ground into the dust by the overwhelming power of an irresponsible union. The company's one mistake was its unwillingness to force its employees to join the union. Ruin and dissolution followed the union's all-out attack. Picketing and secondary boycotts were the weapons used by the union to achieve its evil objective.

Late on an autumn day in 1955 I received a telephone call in my home office at Minden, Nebr., from Mr. Tom Coffey, asking me if I could see him that evening. He came down. He told me of the demands made upon him by Teamster bosses and racketeers, and further told me that they threatened him that if he asked for an election they would delay it and delay it until he went broke. Mr. President, that did happen.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a calendar of events showing the steps that were taken to accomplish the ruin of the Coffey Transfer Co.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The calendar reveals how Coffey was put out of business in 6 months:

August 22, 1955: They received a registered letter from the Teamsters Union advising them that their employees had selected them as the collective bargaining agent.

August 24, 1955: Mr. Coffey met with the officials of the Teamsters Union. They presented him with the Central States area contract and requested him to sign it. At that time they presented him with what was purported to be the signature of seven of his drivers. He declined to sign for two reasons. First, 7 drivers were not 51 percent of his 22 drivers. Second, it was economically impossible for a line such as his to meet the demands in said contract.

September 20, 1955: The Teamsters Union called a strike and placed three of his employees on the picket line at his Omaha office.

September 26, 1955: They filed a petition with the NLRB requesting an election of their employees to determine whether or not the union represented 51 percent of his employees.

September 30, 1955: An election hearing was set by the NLRB for October 20 at Alma, Nebr.

October 11, 1955: The election hearing was postponed at the request of the union by the NLRB to October 25, 1955.

October 14, 1955: The Coffey Transfer Co. filed charges against the Teamsters Union with the NLRB alleging a secondary boycott.

October 17–28, 1955: The secondary boycott charges as filed by them against the union were investigated by the NLRB.

October 25, 1955: The NLRB held a hearing at Alma, Nebr., to determine whether or not they were entitled to an election under the NLRB rules.

December 7, 1955: The union signed an agreement with the NLRB that they would cease the secondary boycott as a strike implement.

December 12, 1955: The NLRB ordered an election held December 29, 1955, to determine whether or not their employees would be represented by the union.

December 21, 1955: They filed a breach of agreement charge against the union with the NLRB alleging that the union was still invoking a secondary boycott by indirection.

December 23, 1955: The union filed an unfair labor practice charge against Coffey Transfer.

December 27, 1955: The NLRB postponed the election which was set for December 29.

January 3–7, 1956: The NLRB investigated both the unfair labor practices charge by the union and the breach of agreement charged by the Coffey Transfer.

January 11, 1956: A strike was called in Omaha, Nebr., and Minneapolis, Minn., against Des Moines Transportation Co. and was settled as soon as they agreed to cease interlining with Coffey's Transfer.

January 13, 1956: A strike was called against Darling Transfer in Kansas City. No reason given for the strike. The strike was settled as soon as Darling agreed to cease interlining with Coffey's Transfer.

January 18, 1956: The Coffey Transfer election was rescheduled for January 24.

January 24, 1956: The election was held.

February 3, 1956: The NLRB filed an injunction suit and was set by the Federal court in Omaha for February 13.

February 13, 1956: The injunction suit was started before Judge Donahue. Judge Donahue died before this suit was completed.

March 15, 1956: The injunction suit was heard from March 15 to March 19 in front of Judge Delehant.

March 23, 1956: Received word that ballots for the election would be counted March 28.

March 28, 1956: The election results were made public. Four votes against the union, none for the union.

February 28, 1956: Ceased operations because of boycotts invoked by the Teamsters Union.

Mr. CURTIS. Coffey Transfer operated in a little country town of 2,000 people. Twenty-two drivers were employed by that company. All of them lost their jobs. The company went out of business. It was as big a blow to that community as if General Motors had stopped operations in the Detroit area. As Mr. Coffey has said, "I did not lose the decision when it was finally made, but I lost my business." When the vote was finally held, not one worker voted for the Teamsters Union. Yet one month before the election, Mr. Coffey was forced to sell his business.

There were other trucking cases in Nebraska, including the case of Clark Brothers. One smalltown druggist appealed to me. He could not get medicines with which to supply the people of that area, because the only transportation available was a truck line which was being boycotted miles and miles away.

There were other cases in almost every State in the Union. We heard about many of them. I am sure there were many more which did not have the benefit of public attention. I suppose that in a real sense we should list as major contributors to the bill which is before us today those innocent victims of the vicious practices of a few ruthless labor leaders. These victims have been the casualties of this battle.

Because of the experience in my own State and the stories which were brought to me showing what was taking place elsewhere, I introduced, in the 84th Congress, S. 3842. This bill was not intended to be a comprehensive labor reform bill. Rather, it was pointed at two specific evils: secondary boycotts and coercive picketing. These were the sawed-off shotguns and the blackjacks which were used with terrible effect by a small group of power-hungry leaders. My bill represented an effort to prevent the use of these weapons.

The same bill was introduced by me in the 85th Congress as S. 76. Again, this year, it was introduced under the same number, S. 76. The Senate, by unanimous consent, has just permitted the discharge of the committee from the further consideration of that bill because its objectives have been accomplished by the Landrum-Griffin bill and by the conference bill. I may say that the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] introduced this measure prior to my first introducing it.

Mr. President, when I first embarked on this task, there was relatively little awareness on the part of the general public as to just what had to be done. There was only a vague feeling that all was not right. Gradually, as more abuses were exposed, the American people came to understand the nature of the problem and to appreciate the steps which were necessary to meet the problem.

In his labor message to Congress in January 1958, President Eisenhower denounced the use of secondary boycotts and coercive picketing. He dramatized to the Nation the need for additional protection in regard to these problems. A similar request from President Eisenhower was contained in his message of January 1959. Again, the abolition of secondary boycotts and the control of coercive picketing were given primary attention.

In the last few weeks, the spotlight of national attention has been sharply focused on these two issues. They were among the four or five important differences between the Landrum-Griffin bill as originally introduced in the House and the two other bills being considered by the House.

The historic vote on the Thursday when the Landrum-Griffin bill was substituted was a great step forward for the people of America, for honest unions, for individual workers, and for the public. That yea-and-nay vote will stand for a long time as a test of those who wanted to end secondary boycotts, blackmail picketing, and other abuses by unworthy leaders.

President Eisenhower's speech of August 6, 1959—and I believe it was one of the finest speeches that a President has ever made—put the case to the country in simple, direct language. Blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts, he said, are unfair and unjust.

As we all know, the Landrum-Griffin bill prevailed in the House. An overwhelming expression of public sentiment resulted in an effective piece of proposed labor legislation. The twin evils of the secondary boycott and coercive picketing were met head on.

Unfortunately, the labor bill which passed the Senate earlier this year contained almost nothing in regard to secondary boycotts and very little on coercive picketing. In my judgment, the bill was seriously deficient in that regard.

Thus when the conferees sat down it became clear that two of the three or four major differences—and perhaps the two most important differences—between the House and Senate bills were those provisions relating to secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing. It is personally gratifying to know that the issue was resolved in favor of the House bill and that adequate protection against secondary boycotts and coercive picketing is now incorporated in the bill before us. Without such protection, labor reform would be a mockery.

The objectives of the secondary boycott provisions of the bill before us are substantially the same as those contained in the bills which I have introduced over the past several years. In a word, the overall objective has been to close the loopholes that had developed in the secondary boycott protection afforded by the Taft-Hartley Act. We all know that Congress intended to outlaw secondary boycotts in 1947. For a variety of reasons the attempt was not entirely successful.

The language of the bill before us closes the loopholes that we have been talking about for more than 5 years. The wording of the bill will do away with hot-cargo clauses. It will prevent threats to employers. It will make unlawful any type of coercion or restraint where the objective is to force one person to cease doing business with another. This, of course, is the essence of the secondary boycott: coercion directed against a neutral. The language of the bill should take care of most secondary boycott problems—certainly the major ones which have arisen since 1947.

Blackmail or coercive picketing was also a major part of my interest in labor legislation. It has been effectively handled by the language of the conference bill.

There are two possible approaches to this problem. One is to enact general language outlawing activity which coerces employees in their right to select or reject a bargaining agent. The burden is then placed on the Board and the courts to apply the general rule to specific sets of facts. This was the approach which I used in my bills.

A second method of handling the matter, and with carefully drawn language it can be an equally effective method, is the establishment, in the law itself, of standards which will guide the Board and the courts in determining when activity is coercive and when it is not.

This approach was used in the Landrum-Griffin bill, and the same approach is used in the conference bill. I believe that the standards that have been adopted by the conference should, if realistically construed, give adequate protection against blackmail picketing. It will restore to employees their statutory right to freely select or reject a union.

Mr. President, we should never forget that the workers have a right to organize and to bargain collectively. The law never intended that an outsider would be given the right to decide for the workers whether they would organize in any such manner. It is their right, not the right of the unions.

The secondary boycott and the blackmail picketing provisions, although very important parts of the conference report, are but two of many. They have been perhaps two of the most controversial parts of the conference report, because, naturally, those who have used those weapons of force are reluctant to have them taken away. So I am glad that a bipartisan committee has agreed to these essential changes in our basic labor law. I have long felt them to be necessary; and I have done what I could to further this objective.

Because of this, and because of my general feeling that the rest of the bill represents an honest and intelligent attempt to bring about needed reforms, I wholehearted support the measure before the Senate. This legislation will stand as a milestone in the continuing effort of our society to give content to our basic beliefs in the right of the individual to be free from organized corruption and terror.

And to my many union friends, I say that they need not fear this bill. Far from being hurt by it, I am firmly convinced that it may well be the salvation of the labor movement in the United States. That movement was built on the voluntary acceptance by working men and women of the idea that unions can make a responsible contribution to our complex society and to the world in which we live. This bill will be a significant step in the furtherance of that objective.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. The Senator from Nebraska has emphasized the importance of the conference report, including the prohibitions of secondary boycotts and coercive picketing. Does not the Senator from Nebraska recall that last April, when the so-called Kennedy-Ervin bill was under consideration by the Senate, many amendments were submitted—and one of them affected secondary boycotts—by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] and by other Senators; but that all those amendments were overwhelmingly defeated, under the leadership of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Does not the RECORD show that to be true; and that although the Senator from Arizona says the bill which was passed by the Senate last spring, when he was the lone dissenter, involved somewhat of deception, and did not fully cope with these problems, at that time the facts were that the Senate, or at least many Members of the Senate, endeavored to adopt the amendments which are now incorporated in the conference report?

Mr. CURTIS. All I would say is that on three occasions we voted on a bill to ban secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing. I believe the first time I offered it, we had 20-some votes.

Then, in a later bill, we picked up some more votes, and had 30-some votes.

When the Kennedy-Ervin bill was considered, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] offered the amendment, and I requested the privilege of joining him in sponsoring the amendment. At that time, 43 Senators voted for the amendment.

The RECORD speaks for itself as to who favored it and who was opposed to it. So I do not wish to comment on that.

But I firmly believe that the American people and the union members became aroused at the actions which were taking place and at the corruption which existed and at the abuses of power and the unfairness to the consumers and to the general public—to the end that the people have brought about this legislation.

I am grateful not only for the work done by the Senators I have mentioned, but also for the leadership furnished by President Eisenhower in crystallizing what already was the sentiment of the country, that justice should prevail; and today we have here a bill which accomplishes a great deal. It will make unlawful many—in fact, the worst—of the abuses which were uncovered by the McClellan committee.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Is it not a rather harsh and somewhat unfair appraisal to claim that the bill which last April was approved by this body, with only one dissenting vote, did involve some element of deception? Is it not true that, in reality, very vigorous efforts were made to adopt some of the amendments which now are included in this conference bill, but that all those amendments were rejected by overwhelming votes; and that to that extent, the Members of this body who made that attempt at that time should not be condemned because of the failure of their efforts?

Mr. CURTIS. Many, many amendments which were offered to the Kennedy-Ervin bill and to the previous bill would have made them better bills; there is no question about that. But they were voted down; and the record speaks for itself as to where each Senator stood.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I know the Senator is familiar with the Burt plant, in Akron, Ohio. That plant had a collective bargaining agreement with the CIO union. All of its workers were contented. The plant manufactured equipment which was installed in buildings. The American Federation of Labor, through the tin union——

Mr. CURTIS. It was the Sheet Metal Workers Union.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, through the Sheet Metal Workers Union—refused to install in buildings the equipment manufactured by the Burt Co., with CIO union labor.

We contemplated, by the secondary boycott amendments mentioned by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], the stopping of such secondary boycotts; but we did not succeed in getting those amendments adopted. The amendments were offered; but they were fought, and were repudiated on this floor.

I ask the Senator whether in his opinion the secondary picketing practiced by the Sheet Metal Workers Union on the products manufactured by that producer—who was employing CIO workers, and had amicable relations with them—will be stopped.

Mr. CURTIS. I would reply to the distinguished Senator from Ohio by saying that today we are providing the law which will stop them. What the National Labor Relations Board and what the Chief Counsel will do will have to be their responsibility. But today we are giving them a law which outlaws such practices as the ones which took place at Akron, Ohio.

I am well aware of the Burt case. The Burt Manufacturing Co. had a union. It was the choice of the workers. There was no dispute as to wages, hours, or working conditions. No other union wanted that contract. Because they did not give it, the products of Burt Manufacturing Co. were boycotted in every State of the Union for 10 long years.

I want to congratulate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] for his actions when he was Governor in preventing the State of Ohio from being a party to such an unjust boycott.

Today we have given the people a law. What the National Labor Relations Board and the Chief Counsel will do is their responsibility. I would rather see the courts have the responsibility, because in the past they have been crusaders rather than judicial bodies.

I agree with Professor Petro, of New York University, who says that many of these laws that we are fighting for are unneeded because the Taft-Hartley law prohibits all coercive and abusive action. But these administrative bodies in the past, by maladministration, have worked to find loopholes to thwart the will of the Congress. I hope that we have passed that time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is my understanding correct that when the Kennedy-Ervin bill left this door there was no provision in it to cope adequately with the problem that I have described?

Mr. CURTIS. That is absolutely true. There was a vote on the McClellan-Curtis amendment, and we received 43 votes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. How many were against it?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, there were more than 43. I do not know the exact number. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. The vote was 41 to 50.

Mr. CURTIS. At least, we did not have enough.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] offered the amendment, and he said that type of boycotting had to be stopped. His amendment was rejected by Members who were sponsoring the Kennedy-Ervin bill. Is that correct?

Mr. CURTIS. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Now, then, the Landrum-Griffin bill came back——

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that statement is not quite correct, because I voted for the McClellan amendment to outlaw secondary boycotting. I voted for the amendment to deal with the no-man's-land problem in a realistic fashion. I voted for the amendment to do away with coercive forms of picketing. I thought the bill was a pretty good bill so far as it went.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, let us remember that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] offered an amendment to strike title VII from the Kennedy-Ervin bill because he thought title VII was not adequate, and he was repudiated in his efforts to strike title VII from the bill.

Is it correct that the Landrum-Griffin bill does in a measure take care of that problem?

Mr. CURTIS. In my opinion, it does.

Mr. President, frequent mention has been made, and I made it earlier, of the great service rendered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. I know something of the long hours and the weeks and months he has given to this task to expose rackets that are going on, which have aroused the American people. The American people have descended upon the Congress with lawful petitions, and the President of the United States has added his leadership. Today we have a bill that corrects these major abuses. I want to say much of the credit for it belongs to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN].

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on the question of the adoption of the conference report, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, first I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska and also the distinguished Senator from Arizona for their kind and complimentary references to the senior Senator from Arkansas with respect to his work in connection with the Senate Select Committee on Improper Practices in Labor-Management Relations.

Mr. President, I could not refrain at this hour from expressing my pleasure and appreciation of the fact that we are soon to vote this evening on this conference report. That will be another step, and the final step on the part of this body, toward the enactment of effective remedial labor reform legislation.

It is indeed a source of gratification to me that we have arrived at this time for final action by this body, and I trust I am not in error in anticipating similar action, and favorable action, by the other body, thus sending to the President a labor reform bill that the country has been anxious to have enacted during the past 2 years.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill will be the rewarding, and a rather fine rewarding, I think, of the Senate select committee's efforts in the investigative work it has done, which has resulted in the exposure of abuses, exploitation, corruption and conditions that cry out for remedial legislation.

It has not been easy, Mr. President, to sit hour after hour, and look at perjurers, criminals, ex-convicts, thugs, hoodlums, characters of the underworld who would not give a snap of their fingers for human life where that life might interfere with their nefarious purpose to carry on racketeering and other evil practices.

No; it has not been easy. It has taken patience and persistency. It has taken some measure of courage. It has taken hard work and long hours. But this committee, I believe, has made a record that not only justifies, but that is compelling in its persuasion for support of the conference report.

Mr. President, when the House passed the Landrum-Griffin bill, and it came to this body a few days ago, with the request from the House for a conference, there were some Senators who thought that a conference was not needed, and that the better procedure—certainly the quickest procedure—would be for the Senate to simply take up the Landrum-Griffin bill, accept it, adopt it, and thus bring this labor legislation issue to a conclusion.

I took the position then, Mr. President, that the measure should go to conference. I said on the floor of the Senate at that time that the conferees would have an opportunity to consider the Landrum-Griffin bill and the Kennedy-Ervin bill of the Senate, take the best provisions out of the two bills, and make a better bill than either of them would be standing alone.

Mr. President, it may be too early to pass final judgment upon the work of the conferees, but I am persuaded at this hour that the conferees in good faith diligently labored toward that end. I am convinced in my own judgment, as of this moment, that the bill reported to the Senate by the conferees, upon which we are to vote is a better bill than either the Landrum-Griffin bill or the Kennedy-Ervin bill as they passed their respective bodies.

I certainly compliment the members of the conference for their tireless and ceaseless efforts, working diligently to get the best possible legislation enacted into law at this session of Congress.

I am sure this measure is not perfect. It certainly does not contain all that I should like to have it contain. It does not represent perfection. It contains, I am sure, a great deal which is good that many, or at least some, did not want it to contain. So in my judgment a long stride will have been taken, Mr. President, towards the remedial legislation which is needed in labor-management relation with the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. President, I think the Landrum-Griffin bill was a better bill in the areas of secondary boycott, of the "no man's land," of organizational picketing and of hot cargo contracts. The Senate bill dealt only slightly, as I recall, with two of those areas. One was the hot cargo area, where the bill was limited primarily to trucking. In the other, the "no man's land" area, the bill dealt absolutely ineffectively with the problem, and it would have been better had it not dealt with it at all, in my opinion.

We have now, in the measure before us, a provision dealing with the "no man's land" problem which does give a remedy to anyone, where a wrong exists. We no longer will have, after the bill is enacted, a wrong without a remedy, a condition that has prevailed now for a number of years.

Mr. President, this may not be the best solution. I had no objection to requiring the National Labor Relations Board to take jurisdiction of all cases, if that were the better way to handle the problem. It was not so much a case of trying to require a State to take jurisdiction, or to give jurisdiction to the States, as it was a case of trying to find an alternative to the situation. We had no tribunal to which those suffering a wrong could go for redress and for protection. I think the conferees have worked out a very fine solution of that problem.

Mr. President, as to the secondary boycotts and organizational picketing, some modifications were made by the conferees in the House provisions. I am not sure about that. Perhaps those modifications were justified. Be that as it may, as I said, we do not expect the legislation to be perfect. In the course of time, experience may indicate certain areas where further strengthening provisions should be added, and perhaps some modifications will be justified.

I recall, Mr. President, in the beginning of the consideration of proposed labor legislation, I felt then it would be better to handle these problems separately. I felt then that we should have one bill to deal with the internal union affairs, the democratic procedures of unions, reporting and accounting, and things in those areas where we had found that a lot of corruption existed. I felt it would be better to deal with that area in a separate bill, which would be substantially the first six titles of the bill now under consideration. I will say, Mr. President, I introduced a bill accordingly. Then I introduced four bills dealing separately with the "no man's land" problem, hot cargo, organizational picketing, and secondary boycotts.

I felt, as I said to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, we should deal with these problems in separate bills. When the matter came to the floor I supported the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to strike out title 7. Again I urged that the better procedure would be to handle these different areas separately. However, that was not the collective wisdom of this body at the time, and we have proceeded to consider all of them in this one bill.

By reason of handling this matter in that way, rather than handling the problems separately, I am not sure we have gotten the very best possible legislation in these four areas.

If these problems had been studied separately, under separate bills—if the committee had heard testimony relative to each and weighed it carefully with a view of determining the particular issue involved—we might have better provisions than we have before us now.

Mr. President, I believe that is about all I wish to say. I know—and every Member of the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, I think, will verify what I am about to say—the American people now know that it is true that conditions could not have long continued, as they have been and as we have exposed them to be, without the underworld element ultimately getting control of the labor movement in this country and gangsterism dominating our national economy. The time has come when there must be legislative action.

I trust that what we propose to do in the bill before us will be sufficient. I am not sure that it will be. If the legislation we are about to enact is not sufficient, if this action will not stop the Hoffas and the Bridges and those elements from forming combinations to enter into restraint of trade and to dominate the economy of this country, there will remain only one alternative, and that will be to place the transportation unions in this country under the antitrust laws.

I do not think any of us want to go that far, but I say to Senators, I believe that the Congress will, and the American people will, insist that Congress go that far, if it becomes necessary to protect this country against the exploitation and domination of those who want to live above and beyond law and order, decency, honor, and integrity.

Yes, Mr. President, we do not want to have to do it. So we shall enact this law. It will provide a test. Will it be adequate to bring under control those things which need regulation and control? I hope it will.

I do know and I do feel that if the provisions of this bill are enforced and if the bill is properly and adequately administered, it is going to correct a great deal of the evil that has been exposed by the Senate select committee.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. May I remind the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that when the Kennedy-Ervin bill was being considered, the Senator sent forward an amendment providing for a bill of rights to safeguard the rights of the rank-and-file union members? Is the Senator from Arkansas satisfied with the provisions in the conference report dealing with the bill of rights which he was interested in last spring?

Mr. McCLELLAN. No. I might say to the distinguished Senator, as I said earlier, in some respects the Landrum-Griffin bill I thought was better than the Senate bill. I can say without any reservations that in other respects the Kennedy-Ervin bill was better than the Landrum-Griffin bill. In some areas, particularly with respect to the area of the bill of rights, I think the Senate bill was better.

I do not think the bill of rights in the conference bill is as strong as it should be, but I may say that we have moved to incorporate into the law of the land a national policy with respect to how union members should be treated. No one hereafter can take for granted that Congress is indifferent to the democratic processes and to the rights of individual union members when they join a union. Congress is concerned about it, and it expects those rights to be respected and protected. This bill is an expression of policy in that direction, and I do not believe there is a Member of this body who would disagree with it in principle.

I think it might have been strengthened, but let us try it this way. There is always the strong probability of further legislation in the field of labor management relations. We can from time to time, as legislation comes before us, strengthen any provision of the bill by adding a few simple words at the right place.

Mr. President, it has been indicated that perhaps one Senator will not support the conference report. While it does not satisfy any one of us completely, it does in my judgment represent the the best in compromise, without anyone compromising principle and without anyone sacrificing conviction. It represents the best of the collective wisdom of Congress today, and the American people have a right to expect us to bring forth at this session of Congress legislation of this character.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Just to sort of tabulate the important parts of the bill, it is a fact, is it not, that when the original Kennedy-Ervin bill came before the Senate, it had in it no workingman's bill of rights, and that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] offered an amendment which was adopted, subsequently somewhat modified, but it is now in the bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As I have just said, the principle is in the bill. It is not in the exact language I should like to have. I think it could be strengthened. I think the language and the enforcement provisions of the bill that the Senate passed were a little better than those contained in the Landrum-Griffin bill. I think in one particular the conferees strengthened the Landrum-Griffin provisions in its agreement.

So again, as I point out, we cannot have our own way about everything in this legislation. Sure, I could take a pencil and run through and strengthen the measure in some places, but that is not legislation. That is one man's will. Our process is the collective will and the collective wisdom of this body and of the other body. That is our way of government, and in the centuries it is proving to be the best.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is a fact, is it not, that when the Kennedy-Irvin bill came before the Senate, it had in it no provision banning secondary boycotts, that the Senator from Arkansas offered an amendment that would have provided bans, but that that amendment was rejected, and that now there is in the bill a secondary boycott provision which may not be exactly what the Senator wishes, but it is a substantial advance in trying to solve the problem.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I agree with the Senator that the conference bill is a substantial advance. I do not say it is all that is needed. The course of time may prove that it is adequate. I hope it will.

The provision referred to by the Senator was not in the bill in the Senate. We tried to put such a provision in the bill. We were not successful. Again we tried to place in the bill a provision against organizational picketing. That provision may not have been all it should have been. It may have been too strong. It may have ignored something, but at least we were trying to assert a principle and to get something substantial in the bill dealing in areas where we knew improper practices were occurring and should be corrected.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The same situation occurred as to organizational picketing. It was not dealt with in the original bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Organizational picketing was not. Blackmail picketing was. Blackmail picketing is still in the bill. So now organizational picketing is also in the bill. I believe they are under separate titles. At least they are in separate sections.

Mr. LAUSCHE. So the fact is that the views of the Senator from Arkansas and his select committee that the bill should deal with workingmen's bill of rights, organizational picketing, and secondary boycotts, are covered in the bill, but were not in the bill originally presented.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct. I do not know, but I think what may have happened was that the House, in the Landrum-Griffin bill, simply took generally the first six titles of the bill passed by the Senate, save possibly the title with respect to codes of ethics. I believe that was stricken out, and perhaps some others stretched into two titles instead of one. They took that with some modifications, I think, and then they undertook to legislate in these areas where amendments were offered in the Senate but were rejected. I am speaking, of course, of secondary boycotts, organizational picketing, and of the no man's land area where we did undertake to legislate, but, in my judgment, not effectively; and also on hot cargo, where we legislated only partially sufficiently.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The fourth item is that there was an area where people were being wronged, but there was no law to protect them.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is the no man's land area.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I call it the area of no law, where anarchy and lawlessness prevail. Those who want no law are the lawless. The good people want law. The Senator from Arkansas said that he wanted no no-law land, and now that is in the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is my interpretation of it. I think it is a reasonably good solution. What is in the bill now in my judgment is very good. I think it will prove satisfactory. I know one thing; if it is enacted, the man who has a wrong will not have to rely upon the tender dispensation of the National Labor Relations Board to say, "Well, you are big enough. We will look at you." If they refuse to recognize the problem and to take jurisdiction of his complaint, of his grievance, then the doors of the court in his home State and in his home community are now open to him and he can seek redress there.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further observation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The point I am trying to make is that through the leadership of the Senator from Arkansas, finally there have come into the bill provisions which should be there. The Senator from Arkansas carried the flag. Others followed reluctantly. I am here to pay tribute to him, whether in his modesty he declines it or not. He did a great job, and the American people should be grateful to him for it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. About all I can say is thank you, Senator; your graciousness is exceeded only by your generosity. I do not deserve all the wonderful tributes you pay me. There have been others. Whatever little effort I have made, others have been at my side, working with me, sensing these problems, and having the same desire and purpose to remedy conditions as the Senator from Arkansas has entertained.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio is one of those of whom I speak.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The inquiries made by the diligent Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] directed to the well-informed Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN], would indicate that the measure now before us, representing the composite thinking of the two bodies, encompasses the recommendations of the select committee presided over by our courageous colleague. Of course, to a very real degree, this is true. It is self-evident that the recommendations in many areas are certainly embodied in the conference draft now before us.

For the record, I would remind fellow Senators that the Kennedy-Ervin bill, as reported from the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, when it came to this floor, contained approximately 45 recommendations of the committee chairmaned by the Senator who kindly yielded to me.

Mr. President, our Senate Labor Committee members, the managers on behalf of this body, and the Congress as a whole, gave to this important subject fair and careful study. It is my hope that our final action on this legislation will reflect justice to all Americans.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There has never been any question in my mind—and this is not a self-serving declaration—that had it not been for a committee, or some agency of the Congress, or some commission making investigations which brought forth the disclosures which have been made, there would probably not be any labor legislation before us. It happened to be the committee of which I had the honor to serve as chairman which was charged with that duty. We undertook the task. It was an arduous task.

We have done the best we could. I think perhaps the revelations we have brought out and the information which has been made available did serve as a premise upon which the Congress could legislate intelligently and effectively. At least we tried to meet our responsibility in that field.

I close these remarks as I began them. It is a source of much gratification to me that we are now approaching the hour of final decision. There have been times when we wondered what the public response was. We wondered whether our efforts were to be in vain. We wondered whether we could bring the facts to the Congress in such a way as to arouse the Congress to its duty and to the need for action.

But now that we are approaching the enactment of the bill, I am highly gratified. I wish to express my appreciation to all my colleagues who have supported this committee in its labors, and who have weighed the evidence and the record we have produced. On the basis of their judgment and their wisdom, we are today bringing forth a legislative product which will serve the welfare of our country, I believe, and serve it well.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, since its creation on January 30, 1957, I have served upon the Senate Rackets Committee, which has been headed so ably and courageously by a truly great American, Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN.
